PREFACE

The 80th Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization was held in Geneva from 2 to 22 June 1993.

The agenda of the Conference was as follows:

Standing items

I. Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.
II. Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

IV. Prevention of major industrial accidents (second discussion).
V. Part-time work (first discussion).
VI. The role of the ILO in technical cooperation (general discussion).

The Conference also had before it a Special Report submitted by the Director-General in application of operative paragraph 5 (a) of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the Conference in 1988 and revised in 1991, as well as a report on the subject by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination, submitted in pursuance of operative paragraph 5 (b) of the Declaration.

The contents of the present volume constitute the Record of Proceedings of the 80th Session of the Conference in its final form. They are presented in the following order:

- a detailed table of contents;
- the Provisional Record, Nos. 1-29;
- a list of corrigenda to the Provisional Record, including corrections communicated in conformity with article 23, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders;
- the authentic texts of instruments adopted by the Conference;
- the resolutions adopted by the Conference;
- the revised list of delegations (including all corrections received within the time-limits specified in the Standing Orders);
- an index of speakers in plenary sitting.

PROVISIONAL RECORD

International Labour Conference

Eightieth Session, Geneva, 1993

Note for the delegates

The Secretary-General of the Conference presents his compliments to the delegates and submits for their information the following note concerning the work of the Conference, dealing with:

A. Material arrangements.
B. Procedure.
C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference.
D. Entertainments during the Conference.

A. Material arrangements

Place of meeting

The necessary information concerning the place of meeting is contained in the Guide for Delegates, which will be supplied by the Distribution Service (in the entrance hall) to members of delegations.

Full particulars of the layout of the premises are given in the Guide, and in the interests of the smooth running of the Conference, delegates are requested to read the Guide carefully and keep it for reference.

The main entrance is situated on the floor below the Conference floor, and members of delegations will enter by the door on the right-hand side of the Assembly block (Door No. 13).

Duration of meeting

The Conference will open on Wednesday, 2 June 1993, at 10 a.m., and is expected to continue until 22 June.

Registration of delegations. Quorum

On entering the Conference premises, delegates who have not already sent their registration forms should, if necessary, obtain such forms at the Information Desk and hand them in without delay to the Information Desk duly completed and signed.

The quorum is determined by the Credentials Committee on the basis of the number of delegates registered. It is therefore important that accredited delegates attending the Conference should register personally without delay, in order that the quorum may, from the beginning of the session, accurately reflect the composition of the Conference.

The information asked for on the registration form will also be required by the Secretariat of the Conference for the purpose of arranging for the distribution of documents, letters, invitations, etc., during the session and for the delivery of documents that have to be forwarded to members of delegations after the Conference is over. All members of delegations in whatever capacity they are attending the Conference, and observers, are therefore asked to give the required information on the registration form supplied to them.

Identification cards (coded badges)

This year the identification cards issued to members of delegations upon their registration will be coded badges to be used for the purposes of voting, which will be conducted electronically (see section entitled "Identification cards [coded badges]").

Participants are requested to note that strict security measures will be enforced at the entrances to the Conference premises and the Assembly Hall. The ushers on duty will ask them to produce their identification cards. Members of delegations and observers not already in possession of their identification cards should apply for them without delay to the Information Desk.

Seating arrangements for plenary sittings

Delegations of member States represented at the Conference will be accommodated as usual on the floor of the Assembly Hall and seated in the French alphabetical order of countries. Owing to the fact that the number of seats available on the floor of the Hall is barely sufficient to accommodate the delegations of member States, observers of non-member States and representatives of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations may of necessity have to be accommodated in the fifth-floor galleries of the Assembly Hall.

List of members of delegations

A trilingual provisional list of members of delegations is distributed in time for the opening of the session. This list gives, in French alphabetical order of countries, the names and designations of the delegates and advisers as indicated in the official credentials and the names of representatives of the United Nations, specialised agencies and other official international organizations and the names of representatives or registered observers of non-governmental international organizations. A revised provisional list and a final list of members of delegations will be issued subsequently.

Programme of meetings and Daily Bulletin

Delegates may obtain information concerning the programme of the following morning's meetings by dialing the following telephone numbers each evening after 10 p.m.

English:	917 14 18
French:	917 14 17
Spanish:	917 14 19

The complete programme for each day will be published in the Daily Bulletin, which will be available at the Distribution Service from 8 a.m.

The programme of meetings will also be posted up on special notice boards in the entrance hall of the Palais des Nations and on Floor R.3 (near the delegates' bar) of the ILO building.

No room, whether in the Palais des Nations or in the ILO building, may be used for meetings without prior authorization of the Chief of the Secretariat Services (office A-577, telephone 76834).

Provisional Record

A Provisional Record, giving reports of all the speeches or interpretations at plenary sittings of the Conference, the texts of committee reports and other official documents of the Conference, is published in English, French and Spanish.

Delegates who wish to have corrections made to the report of their speeches as printed should communicate these to the International Labour Office (Conference Record Service) in writing not later than ten days after the close of the Conference. Such corrrections will be published as an addendum to the record of the Conference.

For the sake of economy, the press-run of the Provisional Record is limited. Participants in the Conference should therefore keep their copies and refrain from asking for additional copies. As decided by the Conference in 1977, the issues reproducing debates in plenary sitting will appear after an interval which may be of up to two working days during the first part of the Conference. Thereafter, the Provisional Record of the plenary sittings of a given day will be distributed one and a half days later, during the afternoon of the following day.

Electronic voting system

This year an electronic voting system, aimed at facilitating and speeding up voting procedures, will be used during the plenary sittings of the Conference. This system has been so designed that it may be applied, at future sessions, to votes in committees (including the vote on the priority of resolutions which will, once again this year, take place according to the usual procedure; however, this vote will also be tested electronically), as well as to the elections of members of the Governing Body (this year the elections of the Government Electoral College will take place manually as well as electronically). However, due to budgetary constraints, this year only the Assembly Hall of the Palais des Nations will be equipped with voting stations (one per delegation).

The electronic voting system may be used for the three types of voting procedures provided for in the Standing Orders of the Conference: by show of hands, by a record vote and by secret ballot. The "voting stations" made available to delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf are equipped with a screen and a keyboard. The coded badge issued to them upon registration makes it possible to operate the voting station. When inserted into the voting station, it identifies the person voting and indicates the language used by this person.

When a vote is to be held, the subject to be voted on as well as the method of voting (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) are displayed on the screen of the voting station. Instructions regarding the next steps to be taken will also appear on the screen.

Vote by show of hands: It should be noted first of all that this type of vote will, strictly speaking, no longer be "by show of hands", but will differ from a record vote in that no record will be published as to how each delegate voted. Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Record vote: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

Secret ballot: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any record of how the delegates have voted.

In all three cases it is important that delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by the delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. A standard form for this purpose will, as in previous years, be at the disposal of delegates at the Information Desk which is situated in the entrance hall of the Assembly Building. Delegates may also obtain these forms at the Secretariat of the Credentials Committee or at the office of the Clerk of the Conference. These specific authorizations, which were formerly handed in to the Clerk's office, must henceforth be submitted to the Credentials Committee Secretariat preferably the day before the vote and, in any event, at least one hour before voting begins.

The names of titular and deputy Government members of Conference committees should be communicated to the Clerk's office in order to allow those members to express their vote in committees.

An information session to familiarize delegates with the functioning of the electronic voting system will be organized at the beginning of the Conference. The time, date and place of this session will be announced in the Daily Bulletin.

B. Procedure

The procedure of the Conference is governed by the Constitution of the Organization and by the Standing Orders, which are reproduced in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference (obtainable from the Distribution Service). The following brief outline of the procedure may be helpful to members of delegations.

Group meetings

The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups will meet separately on the eve of the official opening of the Conference to elect their own officers. They will make proposals for the nomination of the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference, as well as for the nomination of the members of the Selection Committee, the Credentials Committee and of the various committees which will be constituted by the Conference. Only accredited delegates and their advisers may be so nominated. Information concerning the manner in which these nominations should be made is given to each group during its meeting.

Opening

On the first day the Conference meets in plenary sitting. The session is opened by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

In accordance with paragraph 3 of article 25 of the Standing Orders, as amended by the Conference at its 79th Session, at its first plenary sitting the Conference will also establish various committees and appoint their members on the basis of proposals made by the groups. The Selection Committee will meet at 11.30 a.m. following this plenary sitting. The general debate in plenary sitting as well as the work of the various committees will begin at 3 p.m. on the same day.

Plenary sittings

The times of the plenary sittings are shown in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

Delegates (or advisers duly authorized to do so in writing by their delegates) who wish to take part in a discussion at a plenary sitting should give their names to the office of the Clerk of the Conference by written note sent to room A-571 before the sitting. In this respect, the attention of delegates is called to the resolution concerning freedom of speech of non-governmental delegates to ILO meetings, which was adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 54th Session (June 1970). In this resolution the Conference affirms the importance it attaches to the application of article 40 of the Constitution in such manner that the right of Employers' and Workers' delegates to the Conference and Employer and Worker members of the Governing Body to express themselves freely on questions within the competence of the ILO is completely safeguarded.

Committee meetings

The time and place at which the various committees will meet will be announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

The procedure of committees is governed by Section H of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the text of which is contained in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

In committees dealing with the items on the agenda, equal representation is given to the three groups in the Conference – Government, Employers and Workers. This is achieved by a weighting system.

At its first sitting each committee elects a Chairman. It also elects two Vice-Chairmen, chosen one from each of the other groups. The Reporter and Drafting Committee are also appointed, either at the beginning or at a later stage of the committee's work. Separate meetings of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members of the committee may be held. So far as possible these meetings are announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards but, to ensure that they are informed, members of committees should keep in touch with the Officers of their group.

Members of delegations wishing to speak at committee meetings should send their names up to the Chairman or secretariat of the committee (especially at the early meetings, it is desirable to send up names instead of merely "catching the eye" of the Chairman). Speakers are called on in the order in which their names are received. All speeches made in English, French or Spanish will be interpreted into the other two languages; interpretation inter alia from and into Arabic, Chinese, German and Russian is also given as required.

The work of committee secretariats is facilitated if members always sit in the same places.

Amendments to proposals before a committee must be handed in to the secretariat of the committee in writing.

In the interest of smooth and speedy working, members of committees are requested to make their speeches as brief as possible.

Members of committees who are not already in possession of the reports under discussion by their committee can obtain copies from the Distribution Service. Other documents (e.g. amendments) are supplied by the committee secretariat.

Space permitting, the public is admitted to committee meetings, unless a committee decides or the Standing Orders provide otherwise.

Committee reports

The report of each committee is prepared by the Reporter and submitted in draft in the first instance to the officers of the Committee and then to the committee itself. With the approval of the report the committee's work comes to an end. The report is then published in the Provisional Record and is considered by the Conference in plenary sitting; the time is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards. Amendments to the committee's proposals for consideration by the Conference must be given in writing to the Clerk of the Conference. In the case of a proposed Convention or Recommendation, after the committee's proposals and any amendments thereto have been discussed and voted on by the Conference in plenary sitting, the text is referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference to be put into final form. The text prepared by the Drafting Committee is then published in the Provisional Record and the final record vote is taken in plenary sitting at a time which is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

Members of delegations who are in any doubt or difficulty should not hesitate to apply to the officers of their group or to the secretariat of the committee.

C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference

Agenda

Standing items

I. Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.
II. Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

IV. Prevention of major industrial accidents (second discussion).
V. Part-time work (first discussion).
VI. The role of the ILO in technical cooperation (general discussion).

With regard to the second item on the agenda, the Conference will be called upon to examine Report II: Draft programme and budget for 1994-95 and other financial questions, as well as any further related matters that may be brought to its attention by the Governing Body.

The Conference will also have before it a Special Report submitted by the Director-General in application of operative paragraph 5 (a) of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the Conference in 1988 and revised in 1991, as well as a report on the subject by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination, submitted in pursuance of operative paragraph 5 (b) of the Declaration.

Time-limit for speeches

Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Conference Standing Orders, as amended by the Conference at its 79th Session, sets at 10 minutes the time-limit of speeches in the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Ministers attending the Conference and delegates who wish to take part in that discussion will certainly wish to bear this provision in mind so as to avoid the risk of being asked by the President to resume their seats before they have concluded.

Discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General

In accordance with article 12 of its Standing Orders, the Conference has before it a report of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office on its work (Provisional Record, No. 3). A report by the Director-General of the Office is also submitted to the Conference: the first part of this report is entitled Social insurance and social protection; the second part is devoted to the activities of the ILO during the past year.

The discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General will probably begin in the afternoon of Wednesday, 3 June. In order to ensure the smooth working of the Conference, it is most desirable that a number of speakers should be prepared to speak early in the discussion.

Delegates who wish to take part in the discussion are requested to give their names to the office of the Clerk of the Conference (room A-571, telephone 76828) as early as possible and in any event before the closing day for the list of speakers which will be fixed by the Selection Committee at its first sitting. They are requested to hand in eight copies of their speeches for the use of the interpreters and the Conference Record Service. A ninth copy is requested from delegates who wish their speeches to be made available to the press and radio.

Other business

1. Standing Orders. The Conference will have before it proposals for the amendment of its Standing Orders submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The text of the proposals appears in the Provisional Record, No. 2.

2. Resolutions. The texts of the draft resolutions submitted for consideration by the Conference in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders appear in Provisional Record, No. 1.

3. Election of members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. In accordance with article 7, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, elections to the Governing Body will be held during the present session of the Conference to select the Governments which have elective seats (regular and deputy members) and the Employer and Worker members and deputy members of the Governing Body.

D. Entertainment during the Conference

In view of the large number of receptions given by delegations to the Conference, with the consequent risk of overlapping, it has been found necessary for several years to apply a rotation procedure whereby States do not normally offer more than one reception every three years.

To this end States are divided into three groups, according to the French alphabetical order of their names. Under this arrangement it is open to those States whose initial letters fall within the group F-M to consider offering hospitality during the present session of the Conference. Alternatively, groups of not less than three States may combine to give receptions jointly.

This is a matter of practical convenience and in no way implies any obligation on governments to provide entertainment at any time. It is recognized, too, that governments may have express reasons for giving an entertainment, even if it is not their turn.

Before deciding on a date and making arrangements for receptions, delegates should contact the Protocol Service (room A-525, telephone 76862), which will be pleased to help with any necessary information and advice.

Resolutions

Resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

Resolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, submitted by Mr. Arbesser-Rastburg, Employers' delegate, Austria; Mr. Burge, Employers' delegate, United States; Mr. Cortina Legarreta, Employers' delegate, Mexico; Miss Hak, Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Hultin, Employers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Koyama, Employers' delegate, Japan; Miss Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Oeschlin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Pierides, Employers' delegate, Cyprus; Mr. Santos Neves Filho, Employers' delegate, Brazil; and Mr. Thüsing, Employers' delegate, Germany.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Considering that the year 1994 will mark the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, which was established by Part XIII of the Peace Treaty signed at Versailles on 28 June 1919,

Considering that 1994 is also the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration concerning the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization, adopted at Philadelphia on 10 May 1944 and annexed to the Constitution,

Recalling that the Declaration adopted at Philadelphia was a reaffirmation of the principles upon which the ILO was founded, and a restatement of its objectives in the light of developments that had taken place up to then,

Recognizing that in the fifty years since the Declaration of Philadelphia was adopted the world has undergone considerable change in many aspects of international and national life,

Considering that all institutions need to be reviewed from time to time in order to ensure that their missions remain relevant to the needs of their members in a changing environment and that their structures and methods are the most appropriate for that mission,

Noting that other organizations which the world community has set up, notably the United Nations, have embarked on reassessments of their roles and structures in order to adapt themselves to developments in the world,

Considering that the United Nations is in a process of extensive reform,

Considering that the ILO, with its unique tripartite nature and its specific mandate in the social and labour field, has an important role to play in the United Nations system,

Recognizing that the democracy and freedom increasingly sought by nations all around the world cannot be achieved without the creation of market economies based on private initiative,

Considering that the overriding need of today in the vast majority of countries is for employment growth, and that in countries in transition and developing countries this is especially important to underpin the movement towards democracy and as the principal weapon against the problems of poverty and underdevelopment,

Considering that the creation of productive and sustainable employment can only be based on economic growth,

Convinced that the ILO, in cooperation with other international agencies, can make a significant contribution to the efforts of its constituents by encouraging and assisting them to create conditions that would foster wealth creation and employment, and by helping the social partners to contribute to national development,

Reaffirming continued faith in and commitment to the fundamental principles and values upon which the ILO was founded, and recognizing the new relevance they acquire in today's world,

Recognizing the urgent need to review the objectives, priorities, strategies, procedures and structures of the Organization in order to optimise its usefulness to its membership in the light of developments up to now, and to prepare it to remain relevant and useful in the future,

Noting that the Governing Body has already made proposals to improve the functioning of the International Labour Conference, and is presently in the process of reviewing its own method of work;

Calls upon member States, employers, workers and their respective organizations to contribute to a renewal of the role, structures and activities of the International Labour Organization with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world, and in particular to use the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the Organization to:

(a) review its objectives and priorities, and redefine them to equip the ILO with a new relevance and renewed sense of mission, better adapted to the current needs of its constituents;

(b) re-evaluate its means of action;

(c) review its practices and procedures;

(d) reform its decision-making structures;
(e) develop a policy to improve its image; and
(f) devote the discussion in the plenary of the 1994 Session of the Conference to the renewal of the Organization and its rededication to the evolving needs of its constituents.

Resolution concerning the need to review and update international labour standards, submitted by the Government delegations of Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand.

The General Conference of the Interational Labour Organization,

In the light of the joint communiqué unanimously adopted at the 13th Asia and Pacific Labour Ministers' Conference in Teheran, Iran, on 21-23 April 1993,

Considering that a review of existing labour Conventions and standards, which is timely and necessary, should seriously consider the difficulties faced by many developing countries in complying with such standards (many of which were formulated on the basis of world conditions prevailing as far back as seven decades ago) as well as the various socio-economic and cultural backgrounds, development experiences and aspirations of the countries concerned, while at the same time maintaining social justice and the quality of life, particularly for workers and employers;

Decides that:

(a) the ILO should immediately review and update existing labour Conventions and standards, to enable flexible implementation of such Conventions and standards in labour administration and their more meaningful and pragmatic application;
(b) the report containing the results and recommendations of the review should be tabled at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994.

Resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda

A resolution on the above subject was submitted by a person whose credentials had not been received at the time this issue of the Provisional Record had to go to print.

The text of the resolution will be published as a supplement to Provisional Record No. 1 if and when these credentials are received.

Resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples during the International Year for the World's Indigenous People, submitted by the Government delegation of Costa Rica

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples adopted by the Conference at its 76th Session in 1989,

Observing that 1993 has been proclaimed the International Year for the World's Indigenous People and that the United Nations Centre for Human Rights has been appointed, in conjunction with the International Labour Office (ILO), the coordinating agency for all activities related to this Year,

Hoping that this Year will lay the foundation for far-reaching and lasting action and efforts undertaken by the national and international communities for the benefit of the above-mentioned peoples,

Aware of the need to establish between the State and indigenous and tribal peoples new relations that are based on mutual respect and dialogue, in order to ensure peace and social justice in the world,

Considering the programmes and special measures which have been adopted by the organizations of the United Nations system and other organizations, in order to contribute to the attainment of the objectives of the International Year,

Observing the measures taken by the European Parliament and the Inter-American and Asian Development Banks to contribute, in their respective spheres of competence, to the fulfilment of the provisions of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169),

Noting with satisfaction that to date five member States have ratified Convention No. 169 and that others are considering the possibility of ratifying this Convention,

Recognizing the considerable efforts made by the ILO itself to make known the objectives and scope of Convention No. 169, to assist the governments which have ratified it in fulfilling their obligations under this Convention, and to promote dialogue and consultation between governments, indigenous and tribal peoples and other persons involved in social and labour matters with regard to development policies and programmes which respect the needs and aspirations of the peoples concerned,

Noting with satisfaction the establishment, in which the ILO played an important role, of a Regional Fund for the Development of Indigenous Peoples and Communities in Latin America which lays the foundations for a more equitable relationship and mutual responsibility between the State and such peoples;

National action

1. Invites the member States which ratified Convention No. 169 to ensure the fulfilment of the objectives of this Convention, in particular the establishment of mechanisms and channels for consultation and participation of indigenous and tribal peoples in the decision-making processes which affect their lives directly;

2. Invites all member States which have not yet ratified the Convention to consider doing so, in order to promote and execute development and technical cooperation policies and programmes which are in keeping with the principles of the Convention;

3. Invites governments, as well as employers' and workers' organizations to hold, in collaboration with the organizations of the peoples concerned, seminars and meetings to:

(a) promote a better understanding of the significance and implications of Convention No. 169;
(b) identify, in an atmosphere of dialogue and mutual respect, the major problems which affect the above-mentioned peoples, and to consider the most appropriate and acceptable measures and modalities for action for all the parties involved.

International action

4. Urges the international organizations mentioned in the preamble to Convention No. 169 and other organizations to intensify their efforts to attain the objectives of Convention No. 169.

5. Invites the organizations concerned to step up their efforts to collaborate with the ILO in the process of supervising the application of Convention No. 169 and of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), in those countries which have not yet ratified Convention No. 169.

6. Invites the above-mentioned organizations to intensify the exchange of information, experience and ideas concerning indigenous and tribal peoples, among themselves and with the ILO, so as to avoid duplication of effort, to ensure a more rational and effective use of available resources and to achieve greater coordination of activities.

ILO action

7. Urges the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to carry out the following activities and to propose that more resources be allocated for such purposes in future ILO budgets:

(a) to promote the ratification of Convention No. 169 and to monitor its application;

(b) to assist governments in the development of effective measures in the execution of the Convention, with the full participation of indigenous and tribal peoples;

(c) to promote the Convention among organizations of the United Nations system and other organizations and bilateral donors, with a view to obtaining a consensus on the basic principles and conditions required in any programme or policy which affects the peoples concerned;

(d) to intensify the collection, analysis and dissemination of data and information concerning the living and working conditions of indigenous and tribal peoples;

(e) to promote an exchange of experience and ideas among indigenous and tribal organizations at both national and international level, as a strategy to increase their visibility and self-confidence and to foster the development of alliances;

(f) to participate actively in the preparation of a draft Universal Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples within the Working Group on Indigenous Populations of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, so as to ensure its complementarity with the Convention;

(g) to establish and interdepartmental programme for the benefit of indigenous and tribal peoples which combines and integrates research activities with pilot projects in the field and technical advisory services;

(h) to promote activities aimed at informing and sensitizing international public opinion on the particular vulnerability of indigenous peoples and their present and potential contribution to the economic, cultural and political development of their respective national societies.

Resolution concerning the promotion of the capabilities of labour administrations and enhancement of the role of labour ministries in the development process, proposed by the Government delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling, once more, the objectives set out in the Preamble to the Constitution as well as in the Declaration annexed thereto concerning the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization, with particular reference to Parts II(c) and (d), III and IV of the said Declaration,

Reiterating their relevance and urgency in view of the new challenges facing the world of work today, as a result of unprecendented changes in the institutional structures underlying the whole of the international, regional, as well as national situations in all areas of human life,

Inspired by the benefits of tripartite concentration that is the best and unique mechanism upon which social justice can be maintained and promoted as a prerequisite for universal and lasting peace,

Convinced that the emergence of new conditions presupposes new roles to be urgently and vigorously assumed by all the social workers, both at universal and at the grass-roots levels, in the areas of working and living conditions as well as the quality of life of the working people, so as to face up to the new challenges ahead of them, and that their institutional capabilities must be constantly revitalized, thus enabling them to help more effectively to realize the fulfilment of new demands,

Recognizing that the synergy among the grass-roots, national, regional or international conditions and developments has become a dominant feature in the world of today and that the increased interdependence among nations will constitute a leitmotif for the protection and improvement of the working and living environments both for present and future generations to make it possible for them to enjoy material well-being and spiritual development – values that cannot be compromised at any price,

Recognizing also that the same synergy and mutual reinforcement have existed and will continue to be intensified among the ILO constituents and organs as well as the dependent or related bodies, and that they are all parts of the same whole,

Endorsing the relevance and significance of the principles laid down in the numerous instruments referred to by the Director-General of the International Labour Office in his Report to this session of the International Labour Conference, and considering also the fact that developments in recent years have highlighted the need for labour administrations to come to grips with such diverse issues as macro- and micro-economic policies, new technologies and rapidly changing economic and social settings, putting to the test the capacities of labour ministries to handle new situations quickly and flexibly with enlightened training and labour market policies, Noting that technical cooperation constitutes an indispensably enabling factor the achievement of the set goals, and that the new international environment for technical cooperation places greater responsibility for coordinating the execution of technical cooperation programmes on the national labour administrations concerned;

1. Urges the Governing Body to instruct the Director-General to make every effort towards intensifying and further enhancing the ILO's positive collaboration not only with the IMF and the World Bank, but also with other funding institutions and bodies concerned, so that policies, including structural adjustment policies, take into account – as from the early design stage – social objectives and social dimensions which are of concern to policy-makers and labour administrations as well as to the social partners, in view of the object that social policy should lead economic policy.

2. In the same context, strongly supports the contention that the ILO, as the World Labour Parliament, should be a lead agency in the United Nations World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen in 1995, and that the most outstanding role for both the ILO and its constituents will need to be one of an advocacy nature in which spiritual values, conscience-building, policy advice and policy formulation, standard setting, coordination and monitoring play their part and continue to do so in the years to come.

3. Requests the Governing Body and the Director-General to support and actively promote, through appropriate channels, the capabilities of Labour administration systems, as defined in Article 1(b) of the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), with their ramifications extending throughout the systems of public administration, and to further mobilize and consolidate such mechanisms as may be deemed appropriate to promote the capabilities of labour administrations and enhance the role of labour ministries in the development process in the light of the above perspective.

4. At the same time, reiterates that tripartite social dialogue is essential for all decisions, affecting communities as a whole, to be culturally, socially, politically and economically more meaningful, acceptable and just, so that economic policies in general and structural changes in particular will combine efficiency with equity and ensure that economic reform will also lead to social progress on the sustainable basis that is a prerequisite for their success.

5. Confirms that such support and active partnership will continue to be of an enabling nature for labour administrations and will help them to fulfil their advocacy role as coordinators, pace-setters and regulators in the broad economic and social policies and generally in the development efforts, and more particularly to assist the developing labour administrations in building up their labour maket analyses and statistical capacities, as well as to enhance the capacity of the labour administration officials and staff to effectively assume expanded roles of labour ministries.

6. Recognizes that ministries of labour should, in their traditional fields of responsibility, become increasingly involved in and face up to new challenges ahead such as questions relating to the environment, the development process, human resources development – including a human-resources-development-oriented approach towards genuine development – macro- and micro-policies, especially in relation to structural changes of different forms, vulnerable groups, poverty alleviation, young entrants to the labour market and especially questions relating to women; and that such vast and various fields of concern both to governments and to the social partners will need to be adequately addressed by the ILO through its varied activities and through its strengthened regional mechanisms tailored to the promotion of intra- and inter-regional techical cooperation.

7. Calls on the Governing Body to instruct the Director-General to take the necessary measures for the preparation of a special report on the above issues and to consider putting a separate item dealing with the new roles of labour administrations on the agenda of the next session of the International Labour Conference.

Resolution concerning the social dimension of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy, submitted by the Government delegations of France, Germany, Russian Federation and Ukraine

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, which stipulates that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice,

Stating that the right to social protection is an inalienable right of each member of society,

Considering that the social and living conditions of peoples become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound political and economic change,

Convinced that the interdependence of economic efficiency and social protection constitutes a prerequisite for successful national development and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

Recognizing that the main responsibility for establishing a suitable legal framework for the basic guarantees in the field of social protection rests with governments and noting the importance of tripartite dialogue in formulating relevant policies,

Stressing that its specific mandate in the social field requires the ILO to contribute to the promotion and strengthening of social justice in the countries where the social consequences of structural adjustment programmes are most tangible,

Emphasising the central role which the ILO should play in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development;

1. Calls on the governments and employers' and workers' organizations:

(a) to take adequate measures with a view to creating favourable conditions for social dialogue in the course of structural adjustment and thus to ensure that all reforms are carried out in the interests of the majority of the population and are less painful for the working people;

b) to encourage and promote the development of appropriate national economic and employment policies consistent with the need for strengthening the social protection of the most vulnerable groups of the population and those displaced by structural adjustment.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

(a) to promote adequate advisory services and technical cooperation as regards the development mechanisms of social protection, and to monitor the social situation in countries which have embarked on the transition to a market economy or are engaged in the process of structural adjustment;

(b) to assist governments to ensure that programmes of social protection are duly incorporated within their active labour market and economic development policies and promotion of democracy;

(c) to provide necessary advice and assistance to the governments of member States in elaborating and updating their social legislation;

(d) to maintain, develop and institutionalize close cooperation with the international financial institutions, such as the IMF, the World Bank, the EBRD and other international bodies concerned in order to ensure that their programmes of assistance to the countries in transition take adequately into account the need for social protection and development;

(e) to take the necessary measures to reflect fully the leading role of the ILO in the promotion and development of social security and social protection and its resulting particular significance in the process of preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development.

Resolution concerning non-standard and precarious forms of employment, submitted by Mr. Avraam, Workers' delegate, Cyprus; and Mrs. Spychalska, Workers' delegate, Poland

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Considering that all forms of employment should be in accordance with the objectives of the ILO in the field of social justice, as enshrined in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Referring to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122),

Recalling the resolutions recently adopted by various industrial committees concerning non-standard and precarious forms of employment, such as resolution No. 3 (1989) of the Hotel, Catering and Tourism Committee, resolutions Nos. 9 and 15 (1991) of the Forestry and Wood Industries Committee, and resolution No. 102 (1992) of the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee,

Bearing in mind the conclusions of the meeting of experts on the social protection of homeworkers held in 1990,

Considering that the development of non-standard and precarious forms of employment is fostered by the permanent entrenchment of massive unemployment, as well as the tendency of larger enterprises to shift their labour costs to smaller enterprises and seek flexibility in labour and employment,

Considering that these forms of work, which deviate from the norm of full-time, permanent employment and which include fixed-term contracts, temporary employment, seasonal or irregular employment, intermittent or part-time employment which is imposed rather than chosen, job-sharing, casual employment, flexible working time or on-call work, the encouragement of wage-earners to become subcontractors and providers of services, and the increasingly systematic use of on-site subcontracting and off-site subcontracting, as well as homework, tend to develop much more rapidly than fixed employment,

Noting that the particular forms of contracts linked to policies for initial employment or re-entry into the labour market, especially for young people and the hard-core unemployed, such as solidarity contracts and initial employment training programmes, contribute to the increase in precarious employment within enterprises and are often diverted from their true purposes,

Noting furthermore that precarious employment is also growing in administrations and public services, through the recruitment of temporary replacements and auxiliary staff who have no status, and that this tends to call into question statutory employment in public services,

Concerned by the fact that non-standard forms of employment entail serious consequences for the workers concerned making such workers more vulnerable than those who have stable employment, creating a number of differences between wage-earners, in particular making it impossible for workers with atypical contracts to be fully integrated in workers' collectives, which places them in a situation of relaltive exclusion in relation to their colleagues, contributing to the fact that workers who are employed on a precarious basis constantly run the risk of social exclusion, due to the uncertainty or irregularity of their employment, the irregularity of their income, their minimal social protection, which particularly hinders their social mobility and the enhancement of their skills, and tending to stretch, even break, the economic and social links between wage-earners and the enterprise,

Emphasizing that non-standard and precarious forms of employment concern women more particularly and that they are generally a source of discrimination between workers with atypical contracts and those with permanent contracts, to the detriment of the former, in particular as regards equal pay for equal work, overtime pay, annual or maternity leave, and health benefits,

Concerned furthermore by the increased risks for the health and safety of subcontracting wage-earners who are not always aware of the safety measures to be observed and the dangers inherent in certain operations or installations, and by the difficullties involved in identifying the responsible employer in case of an accident at the workplace or occupational disease where there is off-site subcontracting on building and public works sites, and where there is on-site subcontracting; considering, in this connection, that off-site subcontracting should be prohibited and that the representatives of staff should be consulted as to the appropriateness of subcontracting and on the conditions in which it is practised.

Concerned finally by the increasing inclusion of precarious provisions in normal contracts under new forms of human resources management and employment strategies, due to which an increasing number of wage-earners is increasingly threatened by exclusion,

Observing that the development of non-standard forms of work and flexible working time has not solved the disturbing problem of unemployment, which continues to assume alarming proportions in the majority of countries;

1. Calls upon member States to:

(a) implement the provisions of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and for those countries which have not yet ratified it to consider all the possibilities of doing so and, in the meantime, to use it as a basis for the establishment of their employment policies;

(b) examine carefully the development of non-standard and precarious forms of employment and initiate, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, effective policies aimed at promoting stable employment and the corresponding social and legal guarantees, which are aimed at offering increased guarantees to workers who have atypical or precarious jobs, while at the same time limiting the involvement of outside enterprises for all activities which are normally conducted by the contracting enterprise;

(c) provide the ILO with all the statistical data and studies conducted at the national level, by the government as well as by workers' and employers' organizations, concerning the evolution of forms of employment, and the measures envisaged or applied to promote stable employment and to increase job security and the social and legal guarantees for all kinds of employment.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) carry out a study on all forms of non-standard and precarious employment and on the conditions of work, wages, as well as the level of social protection, guarantees and rights, including freedom of association, enjoyed by workers who have these forms of employment; this study should also cover the increasing flexibility introduced in employment under contracts without limit of time;

(b) organize seminars and meetings of experts, especially in the regions, in sectors which have the highest rates and the highest increase in non-standard and precarious forms of employment, as well as those which have the highest incidence of subcontracting and homework, so as to make recommendations and propose strategies in this field.

Resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to social protection during periods of transition and structural adjustment, submitted by Mr. Avraam Workers' delegate, Cyprus; and Mrs. Spychalska, Workers' delegate, Poland

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, as well as the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Bearing in mind the principles embodied in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966) and in the United Nations Declaration on on Social Progress and Development,

Considering the general objectives laid down by the High Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held by the ILO in 1987,

Recalling the Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions adopted by the ILO in the field of economic and social policy as part of the standard-setting activities which are peculiar to the Organization,

Noting with satisfaction the report submitted by the Director-General to this session of the Conference concerning developments in systems of social security and social protection in member States,

Emphasizing that the success of national development efforts depends to a great extent on a just balance between economic and social progress,

Taking as a premise that structural adjustment policies should be designed to attain both economic and social objectives,

Bearing in mind the long-term challenges that many countries must face and the experience gained from the implementation of structural adjustment programmes,

Recognizing that in several countries, in particular those in transition and developing countries, stabilization and structural adjustment programmes have exacerbated problems such as high unemployment, poverty and low incomes, a reduction in the expenditure allocated to social services and programmes, lower real wages, an appreciable decline in living standards, especially in the poorer segments of society,

Recognizing that social protection, pensions, and unemployment benefits schemes are under pressure from the employment situation,

Noting also that the disappearance of many jobs in the formal sector and the increase in unemployment have led to a proliferation of activities in the informal sector, and the consequent loss of all rights in the field of social protection and pensions,

Convinced that the criteria for social protection and economic efficiency are complementary and constitute an objective basis for the pace and concrete forms of structural changes,

Considering that structural adjustment and development policies require active and effective dialogue between governments and employers' and workers' organizations,

Considering that economic stabilization and structural adjustment programmes, combined with low economic growth and the deterioration of the labour market have in the past few years only reinforced the need for adequate social protection, in particular in developing countries and, more recently, in the countries in transition in central and eastern Europe,

Recognizing that no international instrument containing provisions for the social protection of workers affected by structural adjustment has been adopted to date;

1. Calls upon member States to:

(a) apply, with the participation of workers' and employers'organizations, a coherent and effective policy, so that stabilization and structural adjustment programmes will be at the service of man and social justice;

(b) take measures so as to spare workers the adverse effects of structural changes and to establish effective mechanisms for assisting workers who have lost their jobs to find suitable employment;

(c) integrate social protection measures in the design phase of structural adjustment programmes, by taking account of their impact on employment, income distribution, and the satisfaction of basic needs of the majority of persons.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) make provision for increased resources in the ILO's programme of activities so as to make it possible to consolidate the work done on the impact of structural adjustments on employment, wages, social affairs and the life of populations;

(b) collect, make known and exchange, on a regular basis, information on the measures taken in member States as regards social protection during periods of structural adjustment;

(c) conduct a study on minimum wage indexation in the contect of runaway inflation, which characterizes the situation in the majority of the economies in transition;

(d) establish practical directives for cooperation with the IMF and the World Bank which a view to providing them at a very early stage with an evaluation of the social aspects of adjustment programmes.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to:

(a) intensify the ILO's efforts aimed at sensitizing governments to the social dimension of structural adjustment;

(b) define the concept of social protection policies during a period of structural adjustment and to consider the possible need to draft additional standards in the field or to update the relevant provisions of existing standards.

Resolution concerning social security, submitted by Mr. Glesener, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg; Mr. Herrera, Workers' delegate, Costa Rica; Mr. Rabemanantsoa, Workers' delegate, Madagascar; and Mrs Sietaram, Workers' delegate, Netherlands

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which grants social protection to all persons,

Recalling that the Declaration of Philadelphia obliges the ILO to promote programmes aimed at guaranteeing to all persons a basic income as well as health care,

Observing that in developing countries:

- the limited scope of social security and the low level of social expenditure attest to the limitations of contributory and compulsory social insurance;
- the majority of these insurance schemes were designed at the outset for employed persons in the so-called "modern" economy;
- neither the mass of precarious workers nor the great majority of the population benefit from any social protection, as the traditional forms of protection play only a very limited role in urban areas and are being eroded in rural areas;

Observing furthermore, the poor health care situation in some regions, in particular the high rate of disease among children, as well as limited access to preventive and curative health care;

Considering that without the political will to include social protection in development plans and programmes, there is a risk of generating economic growth without social development; that social protection measures should actively support economic restructuring;

Considering, finally, that the methods retained for employed persons are hardly applicable in their present form to the self-employed;

Observing, furthermore, that in industrialized countries with highly developed social security schemes:

- attachment to the social security system has taken precedence over criticism of the system;
- poverty and social exclusion are on the increase, particularly in urban areas in the throes of industrial decline;
- the financing of social protection systems gives rise to problems, as a result of the increase in unemployment, the structural reduction of the volume of employment, the method of financing (with social contributions constituting a virtual employment tax) and increased economic competition;
- social security systems should keep pace with population growth;

Recalling in general that the ILO is particularly attached to the pursuit of its global objectives of promoting the well-being of all categories of workers, in particular the most disadvantaged groups,

Considering that the long-term objectives in the field of social protection are expressed in existing Conventions and Recommendations, and that these instruments, in particular the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), allow these objectives to be pursued through the various organizational models of national systems,

Convinced that the social and economic situation in the different regions calls for a strengthening of social programmes to counter the effects of the economic crisis and adjustment programmes, above all for the most vulnerable groups;

1. Calls upon governments and, if necessary, employers' and workers' organizations to:

(a) adopt, ratify and apply international Conventions concerning social security, and in particular Convention No. 102 (Minimum Standards);

(b) extend social protection, as an important element of a wider economic and social development strategy, by ensuring first and foremost an economic income (harvest insurance in rural areas, economic support for the informal sector in urban areas) and by making provisions for a social assistance mechanism to alleviate the harshest consequences of poverty;

(c) establish progressively a general system of social protection covering the entire population which provides for basic benefits in the event of illness, invalidity, unemployment, old age and family responsibilities, and which is financed by public funds;

(d) make provision, as a matter of priority, for minimum access to health care and education, through recourse to traditional institutions, workers' organizations, credit unions and cooperatives to set up social and health services and assistance for school enrolment and the promotion of the collective contract method;

(e) maintain the schemes (in force in a supplementary capacity, if necessary, with financing from the sectors concerned;

(f) manage social protection schemes with the participation of all the parties concerned;

(g) safeguard, improve or develop social security systems based on the principles of insurance and solidarity;

(h) promote employment by implementing the resolutions adopted in 1992 concerning the promotion of employment and the role of enterprises in employment growth;

(i) examine and apply other methods of financing of social secutity systems, so as not to penalize further labour and employment;

(j) anticipate the challenges of population growth by constituting reserves or reorienting health care policies;

(k) respect or promote the joint or tripartite management of social security;

(l) and, above, avoid any measures of social exclusion.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) give special importnce to social protection in the implementation of the ILO's programme and the planning of future activities;

(b) organize technical assistance missions for the implementation of paragraph 1 of this resolution;

(c) ensure that structural adjustment policies and programmes take into consideration the crucial importance of social protection for the population and more particularly for the most vulnerable groups;

(d) assist in the adoption of objective decisions on the priorities concerning the possible measures and means to be used;

(e) further the search for precise knowledge, in both qualitative and quantitative terms, of: social and economic needs; demographic trends; social protection financing methods.

Resolution concerning the role of tripartism in the face of economic interdependence and the development of democracy, submitted by Mr. Glesener, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg; Mr. Herrera, Workers' delegate, Costa Rica; Mr. Rabemanantsoa, Workers' delegate, Madagascar; and Mrs. Sietaram, Workers' delegate, Netherlands

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that the Declaration of Philadelphia states that "freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress" and that "the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare",

Recalling, furthermore, that to attain these objectives, the Declaration underlines the obligation for the ILO to implement programmes to achieve "the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the cooperation of management and labour in the continuous improvement of productive efficiency, and the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures",

Recalling the statement of the Governing Body in November 1992 when it considered 111 cases alleging violation of ILO standards and principles in the field of freedom of association: "The employer and worker spokesmen expressed their concern about the situation of human rights and labour relations... in several cases, extreme violence was reported... and other cases revealed problems of increasing complexity in labour relations",

Considering that many countries on all continents are engaged in a process of political, economic and social democratization,

Hopeful that these processes will succeed, for they constitute the essential element of economic and social efficiency as well as of the material, spiritual and cultural development of citizens,

Reiterating that the role of authentic and representative workers' and employers' organizations is of fundamental importance in this development if they are to play their effective part in the democratization of economic and social life, with account being taken of the principles of tripartism, and in particular contractual methodology,

Noting that the rapid evolution towards a market economy in many countries, the internationalization and interdependence of enterprises and the globalization of financial markets create new decision-making centres which fall outside the framework of tripartism or the procedures for social dialogue advocated by the ILO,

Noting, furthermore, that the development of the informal economy, the increase in atypical forms of work, the fragmentation of labour markets and the changes in work organization brought about by new technologies as well as the application of new strategies for human resources management make labour relations increasingly complex, thus undermining social dialogue in many respects,

Noting that in the political sphere, supranational areas are being created to develop integrated strategies, the economic and social repercussions of which are insufficiently addressed, or not addressed at all, by social dialogue,

Observing that the measures taken under this twofold pressure of internationalization and the increasing complexity of economic and social conditions very often do not take into account the principles and standards contained in the international labour Conventions in force and their application,

Observing that these trends have implications not only for labour legislation and relations between governments and workers' and employers' organizations at the national level, but for their bilateral and multilateral relations at the international level:

1. Requests all the constituents of the ILO to place Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 135, 141, 144 and 151 as well as their accompanying Recommendations at the heart of the social and economic policies of all their countries and regional and international governmental institutions;

2. Calls upon the Governing Body to invite the Director-General to give priority attention to the need to provide full support to the processes of democratization and the promotion of effective tripartism at all levels and, in this regard, to:

(a) lay due emphasis on the promotion of international labour standards as a principal means of guaranteeing that the processes of democratization and economic transition are consonant with the fundamental objectives of the ILO in the field of social justice;

(b) take every opportunity to maximize the influence of the ILO and the integration of its guiding principles in the preparation and application of structural adjustment policies;

(c) present to the Governing Body proposals for initiatives which would enable the ILO and its constituents to provide a more effective response to the internationalization of the world economy;

(d) ensure, at national level, respect for ILO standards in bilateral cooperation as well as the participation of representative and authentic workers' organizations in cooperation projects and the promotion of the collective contract method, in particular as regards the informal sector.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) strengthen the ILO departments which provide support for the democratization process and the move towards a social market economy, the development of labour legislation and institutions, as well as the creation of free and independent employers' and workers' organizations;

(b) ensure, by taking the necessary measures, that the ILO and its constituents are not excluded from international or supranational structures, and that tripartite institutions or joint national institutions are not progressively stripped of their functions without being complemented by appropriate mechanisms at the respective international or supranational level;

(c) secure the full participation of the ILO in the World Summit for Social Development to be organized by the United Nations in Denmark in 1995, and to ensure that the principles of tripartism are taken into account in its preparation.

Resolution concerning the informal sector, submitted by Mr. Glesener, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg; Mr. Herrera, Workers' delegate, Costa Rica; Mr. Rabemanantsoa, Workers' delegate, Madagascar; and Mrs. Sietaram, Workers' delegate, Netherlands

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia, which recognizes the solemn obligation of the ILO to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, and the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, which call for the prevention of unemployment, as well as the reference to the right to equitable work and to satisfactory working conditions in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Taking into account the basic human rights standards of the ILO: freedom of association, the right to organize, freedom from forced labour and equality of opportunity and treatment (Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 29, 105 and 111),

Noting that the ILO has adopted international labour standards relating to employment policy (Convention No. 122 and Recommandations Nos. 122 and 169) and resolutions concerning the contribution of small and medium-sized enterprises to economic and social progress and to the creation of jobs, especially in developing countries,

Considering that the informal sector is developping rapidly all over the world in the face of the problems of unemployment, underemployment and poverty which affect workers who are desperately seeking the means of subsistence,

Viewing with concern the precarious conditions of work and life of men and women workers engaged in the informal sector and the fact that they have often almost no social security protection,

Deeply concerned by the adverse economic and social effects of the present slowdown of the international economy and by the repercussions of structural adjustment programmes which have resulted in even further erosion of the livelihoods of men and women workers engaged in this sector,

Convinced that the harnessing of all human skills is an essential means of resolving the problems of unemployment, underemployment and development,

Considering that the informal sector, despite the often marginal character of the employment it offers, can contribute to the socio-economic development of a country in so far as it receives due attention and is the subject of a specific policy,

Convinced that the provision of adequate economic and social opportunities enabling women to participate fully in and to benefit from informal sector activities is essential for the success of the recovery programmes (structural adjustment programmes) adopted in many countries,

Recalling the ILO's Plan of Action on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment of Men and Women in Employment, adopted en 1987,

Recognizing that several ongoing ILO programmes address the needs and concerns of specific categories of women workers in the informal sector in the rural and urban areas, and taking into account the Report of the Director-General to the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference on the subject of the informal sector:

1. Urges governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to:

(a) examine all the problems of the informal sector in rural and urban areas;

(b) promote the application of the basic human rights standards of the ILO (Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 29, 105 and 111) to the informal sector;

(c) recognize that women's contribution in informal sector activities is crucial to national economies and covers a broad range of employment relationships including household-based productive activities, home-based subcontracting and various types of self-employment;

(d) adopt policies designed to support workers in the informal sector to organize and improve this sector in such a way that the persons employed in it benefit from good conditions of work, an equitable income and the social advantages inherent in any occupational activity;

(e) extend social protection as an important element of economic and social development strategy;

(f) provide in the first place a minimum access to health care and education by basing themselves on the traditional institutions, the informal workers' organizations and associations, the mutual-assistance associations and the cooperatives to establish social services and aid to education, as well as on the promotion of the collective contract method.

2. Invites employers' organizations to play a key role in removing many of the constraints which impede the transition of micro-enterprises in the informal sector towards the formal sector and in assisting them in improving their technology, their management, their skills and the conditions in which they operate.

3. Invites trade union organizations to look actively for ways and means of enabling workers in the informal sector to organize and to participate fully in trade union activities.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) encourage member States to adopt a creative, dynamic and comprehensive policy aimed at developing adequate social protection for persons employed in the informal sector;

(b) promote, through specific measures, women's equal access to programmes, resources and support services;

(c) facilitate cooperation among the constituents of the ILO through the exchange of information and experience on the policies and programmes that have been adopted for the informal sector.

5. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to attach special attention to the implementation of the ILO programme so as to:

(a) improve, by appropriate means, living and working conditions, particularly with regard to health, recurrent training, basic services, productivity, health and safety at the workplace;

(b) extend the contractual methodology to reinforce the existing associations of informal workers and to make them autonomous, representative and active;

(c) favour, jointly with the employers' and workers' organizations, convergent actions with these groups so that they can gradually integrate, while preserving their specific nature, into the social movements of the country or into the organizations of economic operators.

Resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Bonmati, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Briesch, Workers' delegate, France; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Ms. George, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Itoh, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Rampak, Workers' delegate, Malaysia; Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Reaffirming the fundamental human rights mandate of the ILO, as set out in the Director-General's Report on Human rights – A common responsibility to the 75th Session of the Conference in 1988,

Underlining that trade union rights are an essential component of the overall body of human rights,

Noting with satisfaction the holding in Vienna of the United Nations World Conference on Human Rights and the opportunity it provides for the substantial reinforcement of United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights,

Welcoming the major contribution of the ILO to preparations for the Conference, and in particular the emphasis placed by it on the need for cooperation throughout the United Nations system in respect of human rights,

Noting that an important and growing component of the United Nations work in this field is the provision of advisory services to countries emerging from periods of severe civil conflict or of undemocratic rule, characterized by acute social injustice, with the aim of improving their capacity to ensure full respect for human rights,

Considering that there is need for the ILO to participate fully in the provision of such advisory services, and to intensify further its cooperation with the United Nations Centre for Human Rights in areas falling within its mandate;

1. Calls upon governments to respond actively to the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Rights with a view to strengthening their own activities, and those of the United Nations, in the defence and promotion of human rights.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to continue to strengthen cooperation between the ILO and other United Nations bodies on all relevant human rights issues;

(b) to undertake, in this regard, consultations with the United Nations Centre for Human Rights in respect of ILO participation in the provision of advisory services,

(c) to present to it at an early opportunity detailed proposals concerning action to be taken by the ILO, including by its standard-setting and supervisory bodies, as a follow up to the United Nations Conference on Human Rights.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Bonmati, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Briesch, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Bustos, Workers' delegate, Chile; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Ms. George, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Itoh, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Trotman, Workers' delegate, Barbados, Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the resolution concerning the International Year of the Child and the progressive elimination of child labour and transitional measures adopted at its 65th Session in 1979,

Recalling also the debate on the Director-General's Report on child labour which took place at its 69th Session in 1983,

Welcoming the increased attention paid by the ILO to the elimination of child labour through the 1992-93 interdepartmental project,

Expressing appreciation of the allocation of substantial extra-budgetary resources to the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC),

Considering that full coordination between the interdepartmental project and the IPEC is needed to ensure their maximum complimentarity, and that the ILO policy statement entitled "Towards the abolition of child labour" provides the appropriate basis for such coordination,

Reaffirming that the elimination of child labour remains a major objective for the ILO, and that all activities aimed at the regulation and humanization of child labour must contribute to the attainment of that objective, in line with the provisions of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138),

Regretting therefore the necessity of the Governing Body decision in November 1992 to cease preparations for a World Congress on the Elimination of Child Labour;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations:

(a) to renew their commitment to the elimination of child labour, where necessary through the adoptpion and full implementation of national strategies for the ratification and application of Convention No. 138;

(b) to give priority attention to bringing to an immediate end all forms of child bondage and slavery, child labour in onerous and hazardous conditions and work by younger children;

(c) to take effective steps to prevent and eliminate commercial gain from the exploitation of child labour and to develop and apply efectively sanctions against those responsible;

(d) to cooperate in the formulation and implementation of the educational and development policies essential for the long-term elimination of all forms of child labour;

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make provision to ensure adequate follow up to the interdepartmental project on the elimination of child labour after its termination at the end of 1993;

(b) to coordinate such follow-up activities with those of the IPEC and to keep it informed regularly of developments in this regard;

(c) to ensure that these efforts are given priority in the work of ILO multidisciplinary teams;

(d) to ensure full cooperation between the ILO and other United Nations bodies working in the field of child labour;

(e) to present to it at an early opportunity detailed proposals for the convening of a World Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour.

Resolution concerning globalisation, regional integration and international labour standards, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Bonmati, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Briesch, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Bustos, Workers' delegate, Chile; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Ms. George, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Itoh, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Rampak, Workers' delegate, Malaysia; Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Trotman, Workers' delegate, Barbados; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recognizing that the continuous movement towards globalisation of all types of economic activity is a major factor affecting the world of work which presents the ILO with major challenges,

Noting that this trend has brought about far-reaching changes in the structures and decision-making processes of enterprises as they become more internationalised,

Noting also that a considerable number of countries in different parts of the world are engaged in important processes of regional integration within the overall context of globalisation,

Considering that such regional integration, if geared towards socially sustainable development, has the potential to generate positive economic and employment effects, but that it also leads to the displacement of labour and intensifies pressures for structural adjustment,

Considering also that the effective application of international labour standards constitutes an indispensable mechanism for addressing these issues successfully, as well as the basis for ensuring that trade and investment are conducted on a fair and equitable basis, and are beneficial to the economic and social development of all of the countries involved,

Reaffirming the continuing relevance of the principles contained in the ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy;

1. Calls upon governments and workers' and employers' organisations:

(a) to cooperate at the national level in monitoring the implications of processes of internationalisation, globalisation and regional integration in which they are involved for employment, for the effective application and supervision of international labour standards and for the functioning of tripartism, and in formulating appropriate responses;

(b) to cooperate at regional level in the establishment and operation of tripartite bodies responsible for examining the social and labour issues arising in the process of regional integration, and formulating appropriate policy responses in line with the terms of international labour standards;

(c) to give particular attention, in this respect, to the need for the inclusion of a social charter, guaranteeing minimum workers' rights, in international and regional integration agreements.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make provision for the close monitoring of the implications of processes of globalisation and regional integration for the effective application and supervision of international labour standards and for tripartism and to publish the results of that work on a regular basis;

(b) to undertake a study on the consequences of changing economic and enterprise structures on employment and industrial relations;

(c) to support fully the formulation and implementation of regional social charters, ensuring that their contents are in conformity with international labour standards;

(d) to convene, at the earliest opportunity, a tripartite meeting on the relationship between international investment policy and labour standards; and

(e) to make proposals to it for the placing of an item on globalisation on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

Resolution concerning the struggle against poverty, exclusion and marginalisation, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Bonmati, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Briesch, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Bustos, Workers' delegate, Chile; Ms. Buverud Petersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Ms. George, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; M. Itoh, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Organization,

Alarmed at the extent of mass poverty and its increase in all parts of the world,

Recalling the statement in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere" and that "war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by concerted international efforts",

Expressing deep concern that both rural and urban sectors of society are becoming marginalised from the benefits of economic and social development because of their exclusion from regular employment, adequate social security coverage, and other forms of social protection,

Recognizing that although these problems also exist in industrialized countries, they are particularly acute in developing countries and in countries going through processes of transition and of structural adjustment,

Underlining the urgent need for international agencies to provide financial assistance to those countries which gives due priority to combating poverty, exclusion and marginalisation,

Welcoming the Governing Body's endorsement of the Director-General's proposal that the struggle against poverty should be a priority objective of the ILO's programme of activities for 1994-95,

Welcoming also the choice by the United Nations General Assembly of the alleviation and reduction of poverty as a core issue for the 1995 World Summit for Social Development,

Convinced that the struggle against poverty is intimately linked to the need to achieve full, freely chosen, productive employment in conformity with international labour standards, and that the universal and equal application of such standards is decisive for measures to counter exclusion and marginalisation;

1. Invites governments, and where appropriate employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to make the struggle against poverty a principal goal of their economic and social policy, and to cooperate in the ILO, at the World Summit for Social Development, and all other appropriate forums in advancing this struggle,

(b) to reject any policy which accentuates poverty, exclusion and marginalisation as incompatible with the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment, and the promotion of social justice;

(c) to review their economic and social policies in the light of their contribution to the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, in conformity with international labour standards and through that to the struggle against poverty, marginalisation, and exclusion.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to ensure that the struggle against poverty, marginalisation and exclusion is given due attention in the preparation of the Second High Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment;

(b) to continue and intensify the ILO's efforts to have other international agencies, notably the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, give due priority in their programme design and implementation to the concerns of poverty, marginalisation and exclusion;

(c) to monitor closely the contribution of ILO activities to the attainment of the priority 1994-95 programme objective of the struggle against poverty and to present a final evaluation at the end of the biennium, incorporating proposals for future ILO work and standards in the light of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development.

Resolutions

The following resolution is to be added to the resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

Resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda submitted by Mr. Munyakazi, Workers' delegate, Rwanda

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

1. Draws the attention of the international community to the acute problems caused by the Rwandese conflict, namely the huge loss of human life, the massive displacement of populations and the destruction of the social and economic infrastructure.

2. Urges all the parties involved in the Rwandese conflict to display tolerance and goodwill in seeking means to promote the definitive restoration of peace, respect for human rights, national reconciliation and the establishment of genuine democracy.

3. Welcomes the statement by the Rwandese Government concerning the final report of the International Commission of Inquiry on the Violations of Human Rights in Rwanda since 1 October 1990.

4. Invites the international community to support reconstruction efforts in postwar Rwanda.

5. Recommends that the Director-General of the International Labour Office seek ways and means to assist Rwanda in creating employment for displaced persons and the war disabled, as well as in reintegrating Rwandese refugees.

Standing Orders questions

Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 80th Session

Amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

1. The Governing Body has referred to the Conference a number of proposed amendments to the Conference Standing Orders in relation to several separate issues. At its 254th Session (November 1992), the Governing Body had taken decisions on the substance of two principal reforms in relation to the functioning of the International Labour Conference, on the recommendation of its Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference, and at its 255th Session (February-March 1993), it approved the drafting of the amendments required to implement them through the Standing Orders, on the recommendation of its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The first of these reforms relates to the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body to the Conference and the second to the work of the Resolutions Committee.

A. Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body

2. The following is an extract from the Report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations:

. . . .

> 4. The first change in this respect was that the report on "programme implementation during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning", which under article 11bis, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders are to be examined by the Conference at non-budget sessions, would be consolidated with the report of the Governing Body on its work and the Report of the Director-General on the activities of the Organization required under article 12. This consolidated report would be produced in alternate years for discussion at non-budget sessions and would cover the activities of the Organization in the preceding biennium. In the other year of each biennium (the budget sessions) the Report of the Director-General would deal with a social policy theme. The subject for discussion in plenary under article 12 of the Standing Orders would thus alternate between the activities of the Organization in non-budget years and a social policy theme in budget years.
> 5. Although the report of the Governing Body on its work would be incorporated into the biennial report on the activities of the Organization, it had been agreed by the Governing Body that its Chairman should continue to make an oral report on the work of the Governing Body, in which he would highlight the major events of the year.[1]
> 6. During the discussion in the Committee, the Employer members could agree with the proposed amendments to article 11bis but drew attention to an oversight in the proposed redrafting of article 12, paragraph 2, as a result of which no provision had been made for the annual report which the Conference had requested the Director-General to submit on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. They considered that article 12 should be slightly redrafted in order to cover this question explicitly so as to avoid any misunderstanding, and, accordingly, suggested the following text:
>> 2. At each session of the Conference in the first year of a biennial financial period, the Director-General shall report on programme implementation and the activities of the Organization during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning as well as information on the steps taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General to give effect to the decisions of the Conference at its previous sessions and the results achieved. At each session preceding the beginning of a financial period, the said report shall be devoted to a social policy theme of current interest chosen by the Director-General without prejudice to other questions on which the Conference may have requested the Director-General to report to it on an annual basis.
> 7. The representative of the Government of Morocco made the same point and considered that the modified text of article 12 should leave no doubt that there was no intention of undermining Conference decisions requiring an annual report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. He therefore proposed that a new subparagraph be added to article 12, paragraph 2, which would read as follows:
>> The provisions of the preceding paragraph shall not, however, affect the frequency of discussions on annual reports which the Director-General is required to submit under relevant resolutions of the conference.
> 8. The representative of the Government of Tunisia supported the proposal, which he believed was along the same lines as that of the Employer members but, since it would be incorporated in a separate subparagraph, took account of the fact that the qualification covered both years in each biennium, and not simply the second, which might be a consequence of the other proposal.
> 9. The Worker members and the representative of the Government of France could accept either of the two proposals, both of which seemed identical in substance, and both of which would remove the element of doubt present in the Working Party's proposal.
> 10. The representative of the Director-General (the Legal Adviser) confirmed that, on the substance, the two amendments were virtually identical and achieved the desired purpose. The proposal of the Employer members, however, seemed clearer (as it focused on the context of the Director-General's Report in budget years), briefer, more general in scope (as it was not limited to resolutions) and thus more appropriate in the context of the Standing Orders of the Conference. It was, moreover, sufficient for it to refer only to the second year in each biennium – since during such years there would only be the proposed report on a social policy theme.

[1] Although it was not expressly stated, the Office had assumed that the oral report should be made each year, since the Chairman of the Governing Body changes each year.

11. The representative of the Government of Canada agreed with the earlier points made by the Employer members and supported their proposed solution to the problem which seemed sensible and elegant; it also fulfilled the need for clarity and legal rigour since it kept the focus on the action to be taken, namely communication to the Conference of certain information by the Director-General. She agreed that there was no need for a separate subparagraph since the problem would only arise in the second year of each biennium. Accordingly, she believed that the proposal of the Employer members provided a fitting solution.

12. The representative of the Government of Denmark believed that, in view of the fact that the two proposals were identical as to substance, the question as to which should be a dopted was solely a technical drafting matter. He suggested that the Committee should adopt the version preferred by the Legal Adviser.

13. The representative of the Government of Morocco agreed to support the proposal of the Employer members which the Committee then accepted.

14. In relation to the proposed amendment to article 25, the Employer members noted that another, perhaps more appropriate, possibility would be to insert the paragraph instead in article 12 (entitled Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General). The representative of the Government of Tunisia observed, however, that if this were to be done the wording of the paragraph would have to be adapted to the new context.

3. On the recommendation of the Committee, the Governing Body therefore submits to the Conference, for adoption, the following proposed amendments to articles 11bis, 12 and 25 of the Conference Standing Orders:[1]

Article 11bis

Procedure for the consideration of the programme and budget

1. Unchanged.

[2. At its session in the first year of a financial period, the Conference shall examine information on programme implementation during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning.]

[3.] 2. For [the purposes indicated in paragraphs 1 and 2 above] this purpose, the Conference may as appropriate appoint a tripartite committee to report to it.

Article 12

Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General

1. During the session at the times fixed by the Selection Committee the Conference shall discuss the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on its work and the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the [activities of the Organization as well as on the steps taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General to give effect to the decisions of the Conference at its previous sessions and the results achieved.] subjects specified in paragraph 2 below.

2. At each session of the Conference in the first year of a biennial financial period, the Director-General shall report on programme implementation and the activities of the Organization during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning as well as information on the steps taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General to give effect to the decisions of the Conference at its previous sessions and the results achieved. At each session preceding the beginning of a financial period, the said report shall be devoted to a social policy theme of current interest chosen by the Director-General, without prejudice to other questions on which the Conference may have requested the Director-General to report to it on an annual basis.

1. Unchanged.

[2. In his opening address, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall present the report of the Governing Body on its work.]

[3.] 2. Unchanged.

[4.] 3. Unchanged.

[5.] 4. Unchanged.

5. At the opening of the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall report to the Conference on the work of the Governing Body during the preceding year.

B. Resolutions Committee

4. The following is an extract from the Report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations:

16. The Governing Body had recommended that the tabling of resolutions under article 17, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, and the establishment of a Resolutions Committee to examine them, should be permitted only in alternate years, namely at non-budget sessions. However, the possibility of presenting resolutions relating to urgent matters or to matters of a formal nature pursuant to article 17, paragraph 2, should be retained. It had been agreed by the Governing Body that the responsibility for deciding whether to permit such resolutions should remain with the Officers of the Conference, but that there should be a measure of flexibility as to the manner in which resolutions so permitted should be examined.

17. The text prepared by the Office proposed that, whenever the Officers permitted a resolution to be moved, they would then make recommendations to the Conference concerning the action to be taken for the consideration of the proposed resolution before its submission to the Conference. Such action could be referral of the text to the Selection Committee, to a specially created Resolutions Committee or to the Officers themselves, depending on the nature of the resolution and on the time at which it was received. The wording would apply also to resolutions permitted by the Officers under article 17, paragraph 2, in years in which a Resolutions Committee was appointed, because a degree of flexibility would appear to be desirable here also. Thus, while it might be expected that such resolutions would normally, as in the present rule, be referred to the Resolutions Committee, it would enable the Conference to decide on a different procedure in the case of an urgent or formal resolution which was permitted too late it to be examined by the Resolutions Committee.

18. The new plan of work for sessions of the Conference,[1] approved by the Governing Body at its 254th Session (November 1992), provides for the Conference to start on a Tuesday, for the Resolutions Committee to complete its work on the Saturday of the following week and for the Conference to end on the following Friday. This called for an amendment to article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders.

19. On the basis of a proposal by the Employer members, supported by the Worker members, the Committee accepted the Office's proposed modification of article 17, subject to using the expression "the last Saturday of the session", rather than "the second Saturday of the session". The representative of the Director-General explaianed that there was no real risk that the reference to "the last Saturday" might create difficulties if the Conference were prolonged by one day, and confirmed that such a change would also fit in with the new plan of work of the Conference which was due to come into effect at its 81st Session (June 1994).

5. On the recommendation of the Committee, the Governing Body therefore submits to the Conference, for adoption, the following proposed amendments to article 17, paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 6 of the Conference Standing Orders:

Article 17

Resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda

1. (1) Subject to paragraph 2 below, no resolution relating to a matter not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body shall be moved at [any sitting] the session of the Conference preceding the beginning of a biennial financial period. Such resolutions may be moved at other sessions of the Conference [unless] provided that a copy of the resolution has been deposited with the Director-General of the International Labour Office at least 15 days before the opening of the session of the Conference, by a delegate to the Conference.

(2) Unchanged.

(3) Unchanged.

2. The President may, with the approval of the three Vice-Presidents, permit a resolution relating to a matter not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body to be moved, although it [has not been deposited as required by] would not be otherwise receivable under paragraph 1 (1), if it related either to urgent matters or to matters of an entirely formal nature. If permission is given, the Officers shall also make a recommendation to the Conference as to the manner in which the said resolution is to be considered before submission to the Conference.

3. Subject to paragraph 2 above, all resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body shall be referred by the Conference for report to a Resolutions Committee unless the Conference, on the recommendation of the Selection Committee, decides that a particular resolution relates to a matter for which another committee is competent and refers it to that other committee.

. . . .

6. The Resolutions Committee shall begin its work as soon as possible after the opening of the session of the Conference, in order to enable it to complete its agenda, and shall terminate its work not later than at 6 p.m. on the [third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing] last Saturday of the session. [Rest of paragraph unchanged.]

. . . .

C. Other questions: Maritime sessions of the Conference

6. In addition, another question, which had not been considered by the Working Party, was dealt with by the Governing Body. The following is an extract from the Report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations:

. . . .

21. The Office paper also considered the impact of these amendments on maritime sessions of the Conference which, like the annual sessions, are governed by the Conference Standing Orders. In particular, the provisions of the new article 12, paragraph 2, would not be readily applicable to such sessions, whereas the present wording of article 12, paragraph 1, allowed the Director-General's Report to maritime sessions to focus on the activities of the Organization in the maritime sector as well as general developments in that sector. Similarly, the proposed new wording of article 17, paragraph 1, if applied literally, would make the admissibility of resolutions at maritime sessions dependent on whether they are held in a budget or non-budget year. Further, the day fixed for the end of the Resolutions Committee's work might need adjusting to the timetable of a maritime session. There were also other provisions of the Standing Orders which were not applicable to maritime sessions.

22. In order to take account of the specific nature of maritime sessions, and without prejudice to the decisions that the Conference might wish to take with respect to the future of such sessions, the Committee welcomed the clarifications proposed and approved the terms of a note on the application of the Standing Orders to maritime sessions that could, if the Governing Body and the Conference agreed, be inserted at the end of the Standing Orders as follows:

NOTE FOR MARITIME SESSIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

The above Standing Orders apply to all sessions of the International Labour Conference. However, their application to maritime sessions of the Conference is subject to the adjustments set out below:

Articles 7, 7bis and 1bis of the Standing Orders are not applicable.

Article 12, paragraph 2: The Report of the Director-General deals with the activities of the Organization in the maritime sector and recent developments affecting that sector.

Article 17, paragraph 1 (1): The first sentence of this paragraph does not apply to maritime sessions.

Article 17, paragraph 6: The time for completion of the work of the Resolutions Committee may have to be fixed by the Conference on the recommendation of the Selection Committee, having regard to the date fixed for the closing of the session.

Article 25, paragraph 5: The Chairman of the Governing Body reports to the Conference on work in the maritime sector since the last maritime session of the Conference.

Articles 27-28: (Admission of new Members) are not applicable.

Article 31 is not applicable.

Articles 48-54 (Governing Body elections) are not applicable.

7. On the recommendation of the Committee, the Governing Body therefore proposes to the Conference that it insert the above Note at the end of its Standing Orders.

Report submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference for the year 1992-93

1. The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14(1) of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last (June 1992) session of the Conference, i.e. the post-Conference sittings of the Governing Body's 253rd Session in June 1992 and its 254th and 255th Sessions (November 1992 and March 1993), but not its 256th Session (May 1993). An account of that session will be given to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body when he introduces the present report. The information provided below is a summarized account of the work of the Governing Body, stressing the more important decisions. More detailed information can be found in the minutes and documents relating to the different sessions.

A. MATTERS RELATING TO THE GOVERNING BODY

2. At its resumed 253rd Session the Governing Body elected its Officers for 1992-93 as follows: Chairman: Mr. M. Vargas Campos (Mexico); Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Oechslin (France); Worker Vice-Chairperson: Mrs. S. Carr (Canada).

3. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of a number of changes in its composition and that of its committees and various bodies.

B. MATTERS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. Date, place and agenda of the 81st (1994) Session of the Conference

4. At its 254th Session the Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 81st (1994) Session of the Conference. The Governing Body decided that it should open on the first Tuesday in June, namely, on 7 June 1994, and that the session should be held in Geneva.

5. The Governing Body decided to place two new technical items on the 1994 Conference agenda, one being for general discussion. It noted that, as a result of this decision and having regard to the standing items which the Conference would have before it and the item likely to be carried forward for second discussion from the present session, the agenda of the 81st (1994) Session would be as follows:

Standing items

- Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.
- Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
- Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

- Part-time work (second discussion).
- Safety and health in mines (first discussion).
- The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets (general discussion).

6. The Governing Body also noted that, subject to any decision which may be taken by the International Labour Conference at its present session, the Conference would, in addition, have before it a special report on the application of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the Programme of Action Against Apartheid.

2. Action on the resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 79th (1992) Session

7. At its 79th (1992) Session the Conference adopted resolutions calling for action by the Governing Body on the following subjects: adjustment and human resources development; the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment; employment promotion as an essential component of overall development; and the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families. At its 254th Session the Governing Body took note of the information provided by the Office concerning ongoing and planned action in these fields, and requested the Director-General to take appropriate measures to give effect to the requests made in the resolutions.

C. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

1. Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Report forms for the application of ratified Conventions (Article 22 of the Constitution)

8. At its 254th Session the Governing Body approved the report form for the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173).

2. Freedom of association

Special procedures

9. At its 254th and 255th Sessions, the Governing Body examined three reports submitted by its Committee on Freedom of Association, adopting definitive and interim conclusions in 77 cases.

10. In the introductions to the reports, the Committee on Freedom of Association drew particular attention to a number of cases in which the governments concerned had sent no replies, despite the time that had elapsed since the complaints had been submitted and the seriousness of the allegations made by the complainants. In some of the cases, concerning El Salvador, the Committee finally had to examine the complaints, in accordance with its rules of procedure, without any substantial reply from the Government. Here the Committee stressed the importance of a prompt, detailed and full reply from the governments concerned by cases, as this was in their interest, for in any event once a certain amount of time had passed the Committee examined cases even in the absence of a government reply.

11. In addition to the cases it examined, the Committee on Freedom of Association at the Governing Body's 254th and 255th Sessions studied 34 cases in which the governments concerned had kept it informed of the effect they had given to its recommendations. This procedure is of particular interest, as it enables the Committee on Freedom of Association to assess its activities and to note that, in many cases, the matters it has dealt with have shown positive developments. Thus, the Committee noted with interest the abolition of provisions of legislation and regulations infringing freedom of association in Canada (British Columbia) and Panama. It also noted with interest the solution achieved in Romania regarding anti-trade union transfers, the adoption of legislation on the financial independence of trade unions in Greece, the restitution by legislation of the goods and assets of the DISK Confederation in Turkey and the release of trade unionists in that country, and the reinstatement in their jobs of workers dismissed for performing trade union activities in Panama.

Complaint submitted under article 26 of the Constitution

12. At its 254th Session the Governing Body examined a complaint concerning the observance by Côte d'Ivoire of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), presented by Workers' delegates to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, and a further complaint, presented by the World Confederation of Labour, alleging violations of freedom of association by that country (Case No. 1594), approving the interim conclusions of its Committee on Freedom of Association on these questions.

3. Special constitutional procedures

Representations submitted under article 24 of the ILO Constitution

13. The Committee established to examine the representation submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) alleging non-observance by the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), presented its report to a post-Conference sitting of the 253rd Session of the Governing Body. The Governing Body noted that, pending a decision by the United Nations, it was not possible to identify the Government concerned for the application of article 7 of the Standing Orders governing the procedure for the examination of representations submitted under articles 24 and 25 of the Constitution of the ILO. It was not therefore in a position to set a date for the examination of the report.

14. Following the representation made by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS), alleging non-observance by Venezuela of international labour Conventions Nos. 4, 81, 87, 88, 95, 98, 100, 111, 143, 144 and 158, the Governing Body had set up a tripartite committee composed of three of its members to examine the aspects relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 4, 81, 88, 95, 100, 111, 143, 144 and 158. It referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association the aspects of the representation concerning the observance of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. The report of the tripartite committee was due to be submitted to the Governing Body's 256th Session. During the same session, the Committee on Freedom of Association would examine the substance of the matters relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

15. At its 255th Session the Governing Body declared receivable a representation made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) alleging non-observance by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). The Governing Body set up a committee to examine the representation.

16. At its 255th Session the Governing Body declared receivable a representation made by the Swedish Trade Union Confederation (LO), the Swedish Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), alleging non-observance by Sweden of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121). The Governing Body set up a committee to examine the representation.

Complaints submitted under article 26 of the ILO Constitution

17. Consultations are being pursued concerning the complaint submitted by the Employers' delegate of Sweden to the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference concerning the observance by Sweden of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147).

D. DISCRIMINATION

18. At its 254th Session the Governing Body discussed technical cooperation activities and the effect given to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid adopted at the 79th Session (1992) of the Conference. It reviewed ILO activities concerning discrimination in employment and occupation, including the ratification and application of the relevant ILO Conventions, and activities to assist migrant workers and workers of the occupied Arab territories. It examined ILO activities to promote equal opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment, focusing in particular on the effects of economic restructuring and the activities of the interdepartmental project on women.

19. Following the submission by Arab members of the Governing Body in November 1992 of a draft resolution, the Governing Body decided at its 255th Session to invite the Director-General to submit proposals to the Selection Committee of the Conference for the holding of a special sitting at the present session of the Conference for the consideration of his report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, based on the arrangements worked out at the 77th (1990) and adjusted at the 78th (1991) and 79th Sessions (1992) of the Conference, subject to any further changes or additions that might be made thereto in the light of the Governing Body's discussion.

E. STANDING ORDERS QUESTIONS

20. At its 255th Session the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference, at its present session, two sets of draft amendments to the Conference Standing Orders following from decisions taken by the Governing Body at its 254th Session on the basis of recommendations made by its Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference. The amendments relate to articles 11bis, 12 and 17, paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 6, and article 25 of the Conference Standing Orders and concern the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body to the Conference and the work of the Resolutions Committee. In one case, a corresponding amendment was also made to article 14, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. The Governing Body also recommended that the Conference insert an explanatory note into its Standing Orders to make it clear which provisions did not apply to maritime sessions of the Conference on account of their specific nature.

21. At the same session, the Governing Body adopted a set of Rules to govern the conduct of ad hoc meetings convened under the Sectoral Activities Programme.

F. WORKING PARTY ON IMPROVEMENTS IN THE FUNCTIONING OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

22. At its 254th Session the Governing Body considered the final report of the Working Party that it established at its 250th Session (May-June 1991) to consider the functioning of the International Labour Conference. It reached decisions on the shortening of the duration of the Conference and the reduction of its workload.

23. The Governing Body approved in principle the plan of work set out in the Appendix to this report with a view to bringing it into effect at the 1994 Session of the Conference. This plan would result in reducing the length of the Conference by the whole time allotted hitherto in the fourth week.

24. With respect to the lightening of the Conference workload, subject to the confirmation by the Conference, as appropriate, the Governing Body approved the following innovations relating to the distribution of the workload over the two (budget and non-budget) years of the biennium:

(a) In non-budget years:

- (i) Report discussed in plenary: The general discussion of the Conference in plenary would be focused on the consolidated Report of the Director-General on ILO activities and programme implementation and on an oral report by the Chairman of the Governing Body on the latter's work. There would be no report on a social policy theme.
- (ii) Resolutions Committee: This Committee would be appointed and would meet in accordance with the usual procedure. There was a general consensus that the methods of work of the Resolutions Committee should be streamlined, but the Working Party did not reach any conclusion as to specific measures for that purpose.
- (iii) Other committees: The technical committees, the Standing Orders Committee and the Committee on the Application of Standards would meet as usual.

(b) In budget years:

- (i) Report discussed in plenary: The general discussion in plenary would be based on a Report by the Director-General on a social policy theme. There would be no report on ILO activities, without prejudice to other questions on which the Conference may have requested the Director-General to report to it on an annual basis.
- (ii) Resolutions Committee: This Committee would not be established and the tabling, under article 17.1 of the Conference Standing Orders, of resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda, would therefore not be possible, except in the case of resolutions pertaining to urgent matters or to matters of an entirely formal nature in accordance with article 17.2 of the Conference Standing Orders. It was noted that recourse to this article would require a rigorous interpretation of what constitutes urgent or emergency matters and that it would be incumbent on the Officers of the Conference to make recommendations as to how such urgent resolutions might subsequently be examined.
- (iii) Other committees: Without prejudice to the authority of the Governing Body to determine the nature and number of the technical items on the agenda of the Conference, one of the technical items on the Conference's agenda would be devoted to the revision and updating of an existing standard and, noting the practice which has existed for the past several years of placing on the agenda two standard-setting items and a general discussion item, the Working Party recommends that this revision and updating of an existing standard would replace, or be the subject of, the general discussion item.

G. WORKING PARTY ON IMPROVEMENTS IN THE FUNCTIONING OF THE GOVERNING BODY

25. Following the completion of the work of its Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference, at its 254th Session the Governing Body assigned a new mandate to the Working Party to examine improvements to be made in the functioning of the Governing Body. It considered the report of the first meeting of the Working Party at its 255th Session.

26. Initial discussions in the Working Party focused on the following five items:

- the number, role and functions of the Committees and the frequency of their meetings;
- the role of the plenary of the Governing Body;
- the role of the Officers of the Governing Body;
- the procedure for determining the agenda of the Conference;
- the frequency of the sessions of the Governing Body.

27. Views were expressed on the main functions of the Governing Body, namely the decision-making, policy-guidance and monitoring functions, as well as that of providing a forum for exchanging information.

28. While the discussions revealed a strong desire to reduce the number of Committees, a consensus emerged that the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association should be maintained, and that the Government group should assume the duties of the Allocations Committee, which was composed solely of Government representatives.

29. There was a consensus that Committee reports could be adopted without discussion by the Governing Body, provided it remained possible, at the express request of a member of the Governing Body, to open a discussion on the matter concerned.

30. While a broad consensus also emerged in favour of bringing forward the date for determining the Conference agenda, the procedure to be followed (single or double discussion at two difference sessions of the Governing Body) would need to be further examined.

31. The Working Party was due to meet again in May 1993 to pursue its consideration of improvements in the functioning of the Governing Body.

H. PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

1. Programme and financial matters

32. The Governing Body's main task during the period under review was the consideration of the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95. Details of the discussions on this subject which took place at its 255th Session appear in Report II submitted to the present Conference session.[1] The discussions also addressed papers submitted by the Office on ILO offices in the industrialized countries and an interim evaluation of interdepartmental projects. The Director-General's original proposals are reproduced as a supplement to the Report.

33. At its 255th Session the Governing Body considered the report of its Allocations Committee (see Report II, Annex 2), and endorsed three resolutions, submitted to the Conference at its present session, relating to the assessment of contributions of new member States, including the Czech Republic and Slovakia which had formed part of the former Czechoslovakia.

34. At its 254th Session the Governing Body took note of the financial position of the Organization as it was evolving over the 1992-93 biennium. In particular, it considered a potential shortfall of some $44 million in budgetary income for the biennium, which was due to the non-payment of contributions by certain member States which in the past had always paid their contributions in full. It examined proposals by the Director-General to address this situation, and approved a package of expenditure reductions for 1992-93 totalling $20 million. At its 255th Session the Governing Body again considered the financial position of the Organization for the 1992-93 biennium. In view of the fact that the situation remained essentially unchanged, the Governing Body approved further proposals by the Director-General for expenditure reductions totalling $10,008,327.

35. At its 255th Session the Governing Body noted that contributions received for the year 1992, totalling 222,254,216 Swiss francs, together with arrears of contributions of 51,561,542 Swiss francs received in that same year, gave a total budgetary income of $176,655,328 when converted at the current ILO budget rate of exchange. Expenditure in 1992 was $186,467,075, and exceeded budgetary income by $9,811,747. At 31 December 1992, 69 member States had paid their 1992 contributions in full, compared with 73 at the same date in 1991. The total 1992 regular budget contributions received (222,254,216 Swiss francs) represented 70.2 per cent of the contributions assessed on member States for that year, compared with 70.1 per cent of the total 1991 contributions that had been received at 31 December 1991.

36. At its 254th Session the Governing Body endorsed a draft resolution, submitted to the Conference at its present session, setting the level of the Working Capital Fund at 35 million Swiss francs and approving the required amendments to the Financial Regulations.[2] At the same session, the Governing Body took note of an Office paper which gave a detailed description of the operations of the Building and Accommodation Fund in response to the request made by the Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) on the recommendation of its Finance Committee.

37. At its 254th Session the Governing Body accepted contributions and gifts to the International Institute for Labour Studies and took note of the report of the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit on its activities during the period 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992. At the same session, the Governing Body considered the Director-General's proposals for expenditure from the Programme Flexibility Reserve, authorized the organization of a Tripartite Regional Meeting of Experts on Social Security in the Americas, and decided that the cost thereof, estimated at $116,948, should be financed from the Programme Flexibility Reserve.

38. At its 255th Session the Governing Body noted the report of the United Nations Administrative Committee on Coordination, reappointed three members of the Investments Committee of the International Labour Organization for a period of three years expiring on 31 December 1995, took note of an Office paper on cooperation between the ILO and the European Communities, and accepted a proposal made by the Government of India regarding the joint ownership of ILO office premises in New Delhi, the cost of which, estimated at $640,000, would be charged to the Building and Accommodation Fund. At the same session, the Governing Body endorsed a draft resolution, submitted to the Conference at its present session,[1] regarding outstanding debts of member States and the right to vote, together with the required amendments to the Financial Regulations.

39. As indicated above, at its 255th Session the Governing Body endorsed a draft resolution, proposed to the Conference at its present session,[2] for the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 64th financial period ending 31 December 1995, which would be completed both as to the US dollar amount appropriate for the budget of expenditure and the Swiss franc amount appropriate to the budget of income, on the recommendation of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the present session of the Conference.

2. Administrative matters

40. With regard to pension questions, at its 254th Session the Governing Body took note of a paper summarizing the conclusions and recommendations of the 44th (Regular) Session of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board (UNJSPB), held in 1992. At that session it also amended the terms of reference of the Special Payments Fund, with retroactive effect as from 1 January 1992, so as to provide for payments on an ex gratia basis to the survivors of former officials who on retirement had converted part of their pension into a lump sum. At its 255th Session the Governing Body took note of a report of the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund.

41. As regards the International Civil Service Commission, at its 255th Session the Governing Body endorsed the decisions of the United Nations General Assembly on the recommendations of the ICSC relating to increases in the base/floor salary scale for Professional and higher category staff, family allowances for Professional and higher category staff, the education grant and the special education grant for disabled children. The Governing Body also authorized the Director-General to invite the ICSC to meetings at which matters pertaining to staff entitlements were discussed, as he considered appropriate.

42. At its 254th Session the Governing Body authorized the Director-General to implement, with effect from 1 January 1993, the revised salary scale and any revised rates of family allowances for General Service staff in Geneva, in accordance with the agreed methodology for interim adjustments. At that session the Governing Body also took note of the amendments to the Staff Regulations approved by the Director-General during the preceding 12 months. It also took note of a paper reporting on the establishment and on the activities of the Provisional and new Management Committees of the Voluntary Thrift Benefit Fund for ILO Officials, and noted that a further report would be submitted to it at its 256th Session in May 1993.

43. At its 255th Session the Governing Body examined and took note of statistical information regularly submitted on the composition and structure of the staff.

I. EMPLOYMENT

44. At its 254th Session the Governing Body, through its Committee on Employment, held a second discussion on the subject of social protection and safety nets on the basis of a paper prepared by the Office and focusing on structural adjustment and mass unemployment. It was generally stressed that traditional measures, where they existed, were inadequate, and that it was important but difficult to extend social protection to those most in need. There was an interest in seeing social protection linked to active labour-market programmes, and in discussing these policies in a more differentiated manner.

45. Discussion then turned for the first time to the subject of training and active labour-market policies. There was a substantial discussion on the nature and role of such policies, and the efficiency and equity arguments for recourse to them were clarified. The relevance of active labour-market policies, which had evolved in the OECD countries, to the labour-market problems of developing and transition economies was the subject of some discussion. A number of suggestions were offered as to the scope of the policies to be covered in the second discussion of this topic, including, as mentioned above, the link between passive and active policies and their applicability to countries at different stages of development.

46. As in each year since 1988, the Governing Body reviewed follow-up by the Office on the 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. However, on this occasion the question was taken up in two parts: the first concerned activities of the ILO, covering relations with the Bretton Woods institutions, illustrations of country-level activities (Hungary and Costa Rica) and the interdepartmental project on this subject, and the format of the Office paper was generally welcomed as providing a better understand of ILO activities; the second concerned proposals for a second High-Level Meeting, an idea which was widely endorsed, and various suggestions were made as to its scope and focus. The prevailing view was that the second such meeting should confront unemployment and the issue of job creation and focus on ILO-specific policies: as such, it would also represent a contribution to ILO preparations for the World Summit for Social Development.

47. There was general agreement in the Committee that its work between now and 1995 should contribute to the Second High-Level Meeting and to the World Summit for Social Development. For its next meeting it decided to take up, for a second discussion, the subject of active labour-market policies, with a focus on the relationship of active to passive policies; it also decided to examine ILO relations with the Bretton Woods institutions and illustrations of ILO country-level activities.

J. Sectoral activities

48. At its 254th Session the Governing Body completed its consideration of the programme of sectoral meetings for the 1994-95 biennium, and decided that it should include six major meetings and nine other meetings, set out in order of priority, decision on one further meeting being left open. At its 254th Session the Governing Body agreed on the technical agenda items for the six major meetings and took note that, with a view to meeting potential income shortfalls, three meetings originally scheduled for the 1992-93 biennium were postponed to 1994 (the Tenth Session of the Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers; the Tripartite Meeting on the Consequences for Management and Personnel of the Restructuring of Railways; and the Thirteenth Session of the Metal Trades Committee) and the Tripartite Meeting on the Effects of Technological Changes in the Clothing Industry, which was to be held in 1993, was merged with the Fourth Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Clothing Industry, scheduled for the 1994-95 biennium. At its 255th Session the Governing Body further decided to postpone to the 1994-95 biennium the Fifth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service, which was originally scheduled for 1993, thus completing the programme of sectoral meetings for the 1994-95 biennium.

49. At its 254th Session the Governing Body authorized the Director-General to distribute the texts adopted by the Inland Transport Committee at its Twelfth Session (January 1992); by the Fourth Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Leather and Footwear Industry (February 1992); by the Iron and Steel Committee at its Twelfth Session (April 1992); and by the Tripartite Meeting on Conditions of Employment and Work of Performers (May 1992). It also requested him to take the necessary action to give effect to the wishes expressed in those texts. In addition, it decided on the composition of the Tripartite Meeting on the Consequences for Management and Personnel of the Restructuring of Railways and of the Tripartite Meeting on the Social Effects of Structural Change in Banking. It took note of a paper on the participation of women in sectoral meetings, and requested the Committee on Discrimination to take account of the paper and of the discussions in the Industrial Activities Committee in formulating an approach to increase the level of women's participation in all ILO meetings. Finally, it took note of the Director-General's intention to invite a number of intergovernmental organizations to the sectoral meetings originally scheduled between April and December 1993, and authorized the Director-General to invite a number of non-governmental international organizations to be represented by observers at those meetings.

K. Multinational enterprises

50. At its 254th Session the Governing Body considered a summary of the reports submitted by governments and by employers' and workers' organizations worldwide on the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. It also had before it an analysis of the reports prepared by a working group comprising the Officers of the Committee on Multinational Enterprises. The Governing Body noted with satisfaction that the direct distribution of the questionnaire to employers' and workers' organizations had resulted in an appreciable increase in the number of replies and in the degree to which governments had held consultations with the social partners. Some 109 employers' and workers' organizations had either been consulted or had submitted replies in time to be considered by the Working Group. The Governing Body endorsed the report of the Working Group, subject to the reservations expressed in the Committee with respect to certain paragraphs of the report. It noted that a decision with regard to the frequency of the survey would be made in due course. It invited the Director-General to distribute the report to all member States and through them to employers' and workers' organizations, with an indication that the full summary of the replies would be supplied on request.

51. The Governing Body also took note of information on promotional activities undertaken by the Office, completed studies, progress in current research and developments in other organizations.

52. At its 254th Session the Governing Body held discussions to determine the receivability of a request for interpretation of the Tripartite Declaration submitted by an international trade secretariat on behalf of one of its affiliates. Since the matter was not resolved at that session, it was the subject of further discussion at the 255th Session. Given the divergence of views in the Committee, the matter was settled by majority vote and the request was declared irreceivable.

53. At its 255th Session the Governing Body also took note of an addendum to the summary of replies for the fifth survey, which contained summaries of late replies submitted by three governments and one employers' organization, additional comments by two workers' organizations and a corrigendum on the earlier submissions made by one government and one workers' organization.

L. RELATIONS WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

54. At its 254th Session the Governing Body considered forthcoming issues of concern to the ILO and its constituents arising within the United Nations system, examining preparations for the World Conference on Human Rights (1993) and the ILO's role in those preparations. It also considered ongoing ILO activities undertaken for the benefit of indigenous peoples, and the ILO's contribution to the International Year for the World's Indigenous People (1993).

55. In examining recent events in the United Nations system, it heard a report on progress in collaboration with UNESCO on the latter's project to establish an International Centre for Technical and Vocational Training (UNEVOC). Following consideration of action taken by the substantive session of the Economic and Social Council in 1992 on the World Summit for Social Development, the Governing Body requested the Director-General to invite the United Nations Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the General Assembly the wish of the ILO to play a central role in the preparation and holding of the Summit and follow-up on it, and expressed strong concern that the World Summit should not coincide with the International Labour Conference of June 1995. The Governing Body was informed of aspects of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (Rio de Janeiro, June 1992) that were of particular significance to the ILO. In connection with the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and the work of the Preparatory Commission of the International Sea-Bed Authority and for the International Tribunal of the Law of the Sea, the Governing Body was informed of the ILO's efforts to ensure that labour clauses to be applied through future contractors to workers involved in deep sea mining would draw on ILO instruments and that the ILO would be consulted in the selection of the relevant standards.

56. The Governing Body took note of the report and the consensus statement by the Eleventh Session of the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health (Geneva, April 1992), authorized the Director-General to communicate them to governments and, through them, to employers' and workers' organizations, and invited the Director-General to bear in mind the proposals contained in the consensus statement when drawing up the future programme of work of the Office. The Governing Body considered the United Nations Secretary-General's " Agenda for Peace " and took note of the Annual Overview Report of the Administrative Committee on Coordination for 1991.

57. At its 255th Session the Governing Body continued its consideration of preparations for the World Conference on Human Rights, with particular emphasis on obtaining appropriate recognition of the ILO's own human rights activities. Also in the context of forthcoming issues of concern to the ILO and its constituents arising within the United Nations system, it discussed the institutional framework for follow-up on the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development – the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development and the Commission on Sustainable Development – and the role of the ILO and its constituents within this framework. The Governing Body was also informed of preparations for the International Year of the Family (1994) and the Fourth World Conference on Women (1995) and the ILO's contribution thereto.

58. In considering recent events in the United Nations system, the Governing Body considered action taken during the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly of particular interest to the ILO, including the second phase of the restructuring of the UN secretariat. It discussed the outcome of the International Conference on Nutrition, held in Rome in December 1992, and developments in international cooperation related to nuclear safety and radiological protection, in particular the revision of the Basic Safety Standards for Radiation Protection, the decommissioning of nuclear facilities and the preparation of a convention on nuclear safety. It also considered a report on the size of the task of harmonization of existing systems of classification and labelling for hazardous chemicals.

M. TECHNICAL COOPERATION

59. At its 254th Session the Governing Body, through its Committee on Operational Programmes, carried out its annual comprehensive review of ILO operational activities, including tripartite participation, during the previous year (1991). It thus reviewed the main features of ILO technical cooperation in 1991, trends in activities in the different geographical regions, activities under the different technical programmes and, finally, the measures taken to strengthen tripartite participation. A review was also undertaken, inter alia, of ILO operational activities concerning women and issues connected with environment and development. Attention was also paid to the ILO's continued support to LDCs during the period under review. For the seventh consecutive year, the year 1991 proved a year of growth, registering an 11.6 per cent increase in expenditure incurred during the previous year.

60. The Governing Body also examined an Office paper assessing the training aspects of general technical cooperation projects. It attached importance to the extent to which international labour standards had provided the projects reviewed with adequate guidance even in cases where no explicit mention of standards was made.

61. The Governing Body also reviewed further developments on operational activities questions in the United Nations system on the basis of a paper prepared by the Office. Here it examined the outcome of the Second Session of the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) (CCSQ/OPS) of the ACC, held in New York in September 1991; the First Session, held in Geneva in March 1992; the meeting of the Governing Council of UNDP (Geneva, May 1992); the Substantive Session of the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) concerning operational activities for development (New York, July 1992); and, finally, the Summit on the Economic Advancement of Rural Women, which met in Geneva in February 1991. The review centered on aspects regarded as being of particular interest to the ILO and its constituents.

62. Finally, the Governing Body took note of a report prepared by the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) concerning technical cooperation and the use of national professional project personnel, on which comments were received from the ACC.

N. STANDING BODIES AND MEETINGS

63. During the period under review, the Governing Body fixed the date, place, agenda and composition of meetings provided for in the programme and budget, took decisions as called for on the membership of standing bodies and appointed delegations to represent it at ILO meetings. It also reviewed information submitted by the Director-General on symposia, seminars and similar meetings financed under the regular budget and from extra-budgetary sources.

64. At its 254th Session the Governing Body considered the record of the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO (Caracas, 30 September-7 October 1992). It expressed its appreciation to the Government of Venezuela for the facilities provided to the Conference, and to the Government and the employers' and workers' organizations of Venezuela for the hospitality extended to participants. It authorized the Director-General to distribute the texts of the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Conference, requesting him to take the necessary measures for their implementation. These texts concerned ILO activities in the region; the ILO and the consolidation of democracy; and technical cooperation in the Americas.

65. Also at its 254th Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Environment and the World of Work (Geneva, November 1992), intended in part as the ILO's response to the conclusions of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, authorizing its distribution and requesting the Director-General to take account of its conclusions in drawing up future programme proposals.

66. At its 255th Session the Governing Body took note of the report of the Fifteenth International Conference of Labour Statisticians and authorized its distribution.

67. During the period under review, the Governing Body authorized the Director-General to invite various intergovernmental and non-governmental international organizations to be represented at the present session of the Conference and at other ILO meetings.

O. INTERNATIONAL TRAINING CENTRE OF THE ILO, TURIN

68. At its 253rd Session the Governing Body took note of the report on the 53rd Session of the Board of the Centre, held in Turin on 22 May 1992, which was also discussed by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. The report covered activities completed in 1991 and budgetary prospects for 1992 and 1993.

69. An analysis of the state of progress of the Development Plan showed that efforts to integrate and establish productive interaction with ILO technical branches were bearing their first fruit. The Centre's activities had broadened to include training in the fields of industrial relations, social security, working conditions and environment, active labour-market policies and international labour standards, which covers the bulk of the Organization's field of competence. The principle of complementarity between the areas of competence and responsibilities respectively of the technical branches and the Turin Centre was fully reflected in this development. The combination of the Centre's expertise in the training field with that of the ILO's technical branches was the clearest possible expression of efforts to achieve the objective of integration contained in the five-year plan.

70. The essential role of training in the introduction of the new technical cooperation machinery, together with the growing use of the Centre by the United Nations system illustrates the second objective of the Development Plan. This opening up to the United Nations system is encouraging: in the long term it should enable the Turin Centre to design and implement training activities to strengthen the responsibilities of States in managing development cooperation.

71. It will also ensure the continual involvement of the ILO in programmes implemented by the United Nations system, such as workshops provided by the Centre on the problems of coordinating development aid, aimed at coordinators, UNDP resident representatives and field officials of the specialized agencies. In this way the Centre also serves the ILO by providing access to the knowledge and experience of the Organization, for example, concerning international labour standards on the main social problems of the modern world.

P. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR LABOUR STUDIES

72. At its 254th Session the Governing Body discussed and took note of the report of the 34th Session of the Board of the Institute, held in November 1992. The Governing Body noted the concentration of the Institute's activities in 1992 on the core themes of the causal relationship between labour institutions, industrial organization and economic development, and the consequent redirection of the Institute's substantive programmes. It also noted the innovative nature of the work being undertaken by the Institute and its efforts to initiate a systematic process of consultation and closer collaboration with ILO departments, practitioners, and academics in exploring subjects of future concern to the Organization. The Governing Body accepted with gratitude a number of grants and contributions made to the Institute in 1992.

Q. OTHER MATTERS

73. At its 254th Session the Governing Body took note that the Republic of Slovenia, the Republic of Moldova, the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Uzbekistan had become members of the ILO, and at its 255th Session that the Republic of Armenia, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic had also become members of the ILO. At its 255th Session it took note that the Government group had decided to appoint the Czech Republic to the Government deputy member seat on the Governing Body which had become vacant upon the dissolution of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic.

74. At its 255th Session the Governing Body instructed the Director-General to take no action as regards the invitation to the present session of the International Labour Conference of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) or with regard to any credentials submitted on behalf of that State at the present session of the Conference notwithstanding the absence of such an invitation, as long as that State had not been recognized by the United Nations as the continuation of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or admitted to the International Labour Organization as a new Member.

75. At its 255th Session the Governing Body decided that the election for the appointment of the Director-General should take place on Thursday, 27 May 1993, in accordance with the rules adopted in 1988, and that candidatures must reach its Chairman by 26 April.

76. At its 255th Session the Governing Body set up a Working Party to consider all matters relating to the ILO's participation in the World Summit for Social Development, scheduled to be held in 1995.

77. Also at its 255th Session, the Governing Body authorized the Director-General to communicate to the ILO's constituents a set of proposals concerning possible activities to be undertaken at the national level to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which would both fall in 1994. These proposals include the organizing of various public events and the ratification of Conventions.

78. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the deaths of prominent ILO personalities, the progress of international labour legislation, internal administration and documents and publications issued by the Office.

Second item on the agenda: Programme and Budget proposals and other financial questions

Further information and proposals submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to the 80th Session of the Conference

1. This number of the Provisional Record includes information and proposals by the Governing Body in respect of:

A. Change in treatment of income from sales of publications (paragraph 2).

B. Proposed gift of land by the Government of Pakistan for ILO premises in Islamabad (paragraph 4).

C. Scale of assessment of contributions for 1994 (paragraph 6).

D. Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95:

- Budget exchange rate (paragraph 8).

Appendix I	Extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993)
Appendix II	Extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993)
Appendix III	Extract from the Report of the Allocations Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993)
Appendix IV	Statements showing the status of collection of annual contributions
Appendix V	Draft scale of assessments for 1994

The points for decision are in paragraphs 3, 5, 7.

A. CHANGE IN TREATMENT OF INCOME FROM SALES OF PUBLICATIONS

2. Appendix I contains an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993).

FOR DECISION

3. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee the Governing decided on 28 May 1993 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 80th Session (June 1993) for adoption:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
> Decides to amend with effect from 1 January 1994 paragraph 2 of article 11 of the Financial Regulations, which reads as follows:
> The Director-General may pay up to 75 per cent of the income from the sale of publications, including related royalties and fees, into a Publications Revolving Fund in accordance with rules to be established for the Fund under article 40 of these Regulations.

by substituting the figure 100 per cent for that of 75 per cent.

B. Proposed gift of land by the Government of Pakistan for ILO Premises in Islamabad

4. Appendix II contains an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993).

FOR DECISION

5. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee the Governing decided on 28 May 1993 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 80th Session (June 1993) for adoption:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
> Authorizes the Governing Body, pursuant to article 12, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, to accept, if it thinks fit after a full examination of the matter, the gift of a plot of leasehold land made by the Government of Pakistan, for the purpose of constructing premises to house the ILO office in Islamabad.

C. SCALE OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1994

6. Appendix III contains an extract from the Report of the Allocations Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993).

FOR DECISION

7. On the recommendation of its Allocations Committee the Governing decided on 28 May 1993 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 80th Session (June 1993) for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, adopts for 1994 the scale of assessments for member States' contributions set out in column 4 of Appendix V to this Provisional Record.

D. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS FOR 1994-95 - BUDGET EXCHANGE RATES

8. The following is an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 256th Session (May 1993):

Budget exchange rate

9. The Committee took note of an Office paper advising that the final budget rate of exchange to be used to value the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 would be set at the market rate of exchange prevailing at the time when the draft programme and budget was reviewed by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the 80th Session of the Conference in June 1993.

Other financial and general questions

(Eighth item on the agenda)

Change in treatment of income from sales of publications

102. The Committee had before it a document concerning the receipts from the sales of publications.

103. Miss Mackie said the Employers thought the document contained a very sensible proposal. It was highly unsatisfactory that the work of the Publications Branch could not be properly carried out because of the lack of funds and she voiced strong support for the point for decision.

104. Mr. Vanni, for the Worker members, said that promotional expenses and the printing of publications had to be properly funded and he supported the point for decision.

105. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom expressed strong support for the point for decision in the Office paper.

106. The representative of the Government of the Russian Federation supported the point for decision and hoped that ILO publications could be translated into more local languages and thus be available to a wider readership.

107. The Committee proposes that the Governing Body recommend to the Conference an amendment to article 11, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations with effect from 1 January 1994 with a view to giving the Director-General the authority to credit to the Publications Revolving Fund up to 100 per cent of all income from the sale of ILO publications and documents and related royalties, to be used in accordance with rules established for the Fund under article 40 of the Financial Regulations, and propose the following draft resolution for adoption by the Conference at its next session:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
> Decides to amend with effect from 1 January 1994 paragraph 2 of article 11 of the Financial Regulations, which reads as follows:
> The Director-General may pay up to 75 per cent of the income from the sale of publications, including related royalties and fees, into a Publications Revolving Fund in accordance with rules to be established for the Fund under article 40 of these Regulations.

by substituting the figure 100 per cent for that of 75 per cent.

ILO premises in Islamabad

(Sixth item on the agenda)

36. The Committee had before it a paper dealing with new premises for the ILO Office in Islamabad.

37. Miss Mackie, speaking on behalf of the Employer members, expressed her appreciation and gratitude to the Government of Pakistan for its generous offer.

38. Mr. Vanni, speaking on behalf of the Worker members, also expressed his thanks for the generosity shown by the Government of Pakistan in offering a plot of land to the ILO for the construction of office premises, in which Government, Employer and Worker representatives could meet.

39. The representative of the Government of India welcomed the generous offer of the Government of Pakistan and agreed with the advantages associated with the ILO acquiring its own premises in Islamabad. The proposals contained in paragraphs 8 and 9 were therefore fully supported.

40. The representative of the Government of Bangladesh expressed appreciation for the generous gesture of the Government of Pakistan, supported fully the proposals contained in the paper under discussion and confirmed the Government of Bangladesh's commitment to provide land in Dhaka should the ILO decide to build its own premises there.

41. The representative of the Government of the United States thanked the Government of Pakistan for its very attractive and generous offer, and hoped that further study of the construction of the premises would include an examination of a range of reasonable options. He therefore suggested that the decision in paragraph 8 should be amended accordingly.

42. The representative of the Government of Denmark expressed gratitude for the generous offer made by the Government of Pakistan, and observed that the Governing Body's earlier decision to transfer 2 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund for the budgetary surplus of the 1990-91 biennium had certainly proved to be a wise one.

43. The representative of the Government of Pakistan said that his Government was pleased to contribute land for the construction of an independent ILO office in Islamabad, and recognized the invaluable services rendered by the ILO in achieving a harmonious tripartite relationship in Pakistan. As the activities of the ILO in Pakistan continued to expand, it was felt that the Government's donation would enhance the future capabilities of the ILO office and further strengthen the Government's cooperation with the ILO.

44. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body authorize the Director-General to draw up outline plans and cost estimates for submission to the Building Subcommittee at the 258th (November 1993) Session of the Governing Body with a view to preparing final recommendations.

45. The Committee also recommends that the Governing Body propose to the Conference at its 80th (1993) Session that, under article 12, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, the Conference authorize the acceptance of a gift by the Government of Pakistan of land on which to build premises for the ILO office in Islamabad, subject to a final decision on such acceptance by the Governing Body at a later stage, and adopt a resolution in the following terms:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
> Authorizes the Governing Body, pursuant to article 12, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, to accept, if it thinks fit after a full examination of the matter, the gift of a plot of leasehold land made by the Government of Pakistan, for the purpose of constructing premises to house the ILO office in Islamabad.

APPENDIX III

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 256TH SESSION (MAY 1993)

Scales of assessment of contributions to the Budget for the 1994-95 financial period

(Second item on the agenda)

8. The Committee had before it a paper recommending a draft scale of assessments for 1994 for proposal to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

9. Since 1977 the scales of assessment used for determining the contributions of member States of the ILO had been based on the United Nations scales of assessment on its member States. The UN scale was adopted by the General Assembly every third year, upon the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, following proposals made by the UN Committee on Contributions. The ILO scale of assessments was adjusted arithmetically for differences in membership between the two organizations, with the maximum and minimum rates set at 25 per cent and 0.01 per cent respectively as in the UN scale. The major specialized agencies most comparable with the ILO in terms of structure and size (WHO, UNESCO and FAO) prepared their scales of assessment in this manner and adjusted them when the UN scale changed.

10. In December 1991, the forty-sixth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations had adopted a scale of assessments for the contributions of member States to the regular budget of the United Nations for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994. This scale formed the basis for a draft ILO scale of assessments for the 1993 year which was recommended by the Allocations Committee, endorsed by the Governing Body, and adopted by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference upon the recommendation of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. Consequent upon proposals made by the Committee on Contributions following its 52nd meeting in June-July 1992 and recommendations made by the Fifth Committee, the General Assembly of the United Nations in December 1992 had approved revisions to the original 1992-94 scale that would be applicable for 1993 and 1994.

11. The revisions made to the 1992-94 UN scale by the General Assembly in December 1992 included major changes relating to member States previously covered by the membership of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), and which were now member States of the UN. A comparison between the rates of assessment for these member States in the original 1992-94 UN scale and their rates of assessment for 1993 and 1994 gave the following results:

State	Rate in original UN scale for 1992-94 % Col. 1	Rate in revised UN scale for 1993 and 1994 % Col. 2	Increase or (Decrease) % Col. 3
Armenia	-	0.13	0.13
Azerbaijan	-	0.22	0.22
Belarus	0.31	0.48	0.17
Estonia	-	0.07	0.07
Georgia	-	0.21	0.21
Latvia	-	0.13	0.13
Lithuania	-	0.15	0.15
Kazakhstan	-	0.35	0.35
Kyrgyzstan	-	0.06	0.06
Republic of Moldova	-	0.15	0.15
Russian Federation		6.71)
The former USSR	9.41	)	(2.70)
Tajikistan	-	0.05	0.05
Turkmenistan	-	0.06	0.06
Ukraine	1.18	1.87	0.69
Uzbekistan	-	0.26	0.26
Total	10.90	10.90	-

The above rates of assessment in the revised UN scale included Georgia (0.21 per cent), Kazakhstan (0.35 per cent), Tajikistan (0.05 per cent) and Turkmenistan (0.06 per cent), which totalled 0.67 per cent. These four States were not Members of the ILO and therefore were not included in the scale proposed to the Committee; the equivalent of their combined rates of assessment in the UN would therefore be borne by the member States of the ILO (except those at the maximum and minimum rates).

12. The revised UN scale also included three new member States that formed part of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Yugoslavia): Bosnia and Herzegovina (0.04 per cent), Croatia (0.13 per cent) and Slovenia (0.09 per cent). It was decided by the General Assembly that the total of the rates of assessment of these member States (0.26 per cent) would be deducted from that of Yugoslavia in the original UN scale, which gave a revised rate for Yugoslavia for 1993 and 1994 of 0.16 per cent. Croatia,

Slovenia and Yugoslavia were included in the proposed ILO scale at their UN rates of 0.13 per cent, 0.09 per cent and 0.16 per cent respectively, but as Bosnia and Herzegovina was not a Member of the ILO the equivalent of its rate of assessment in the UN of 0.04 per cent rate would in effect be borne by the member States of the ILO, except those at the maximum and minimum rates.

13. The former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (Czechoslovakia), which ceased to exist on 31 December 1992, was included in the original UN scale of assessments at the rate of 0.55 per cent. After adjustment for differences in membership between the UN and the ILO it was included in the ILO scale of assessments for 1993 approved by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the Conference at 0.54 per cent. The total of the rates of assessment of the full membership of the UN in the revised scale of December 1992 was 100.03 per cent, including Czechoslovakia at 0.55 per cent, but as it was already known that this member State would cease to exist on 31 December 1992 the scale of assessments for 1993 was reduced by this amount to 99.48 per cent. This reduction of the scale to 99.48 per cent resulted in the contributions of member States to the UN regular budget for 1993 being higher than they would have been if the 1993 scale of assessments had remained at 100.03 per cent. As explained in the document considered under the first item of the Committee's agenda, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic were both Members of the ILO but their rates of assessment in the UN would not be established by the General Assembly until late in 1993. As the definitive rates of assessment in the UN of the two Republics were not available for inclusion in the scale of assessments being proposed, and in order to avoid placing an additional burden on other member States in the ILO scale as a result, it was proposed that both the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic be included at provisional rates in the scale. Although it could reasonably be assumed that the total of the rates to be fixed for the two Republics would approximate that of the former Czechoslovakia, the exact proportion for each was unknown at this time. As further explained in the paper considered under the first item of the agenda, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic had agreed to make provisional payments against their 1993 contributions on the basis of two thirds and one third respectively of the amount payable by the former Czechoslovakia for 1993. Accordingly, in the absence of better information, it was proposed that the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic be included in the scale at rates of assessment based upon that for the former Czechoslovakia in the original 1992-94 UN scale of 0.55 per cent, allocated to the two Republics in rounded percentage points in the proportion of two thirds and one third respectively. This would give provisional ILO rates of 0.37 per cent for the Czech Republic and 0.18 per cent for the Slovak Republic. The definitive UN rates of assessment might differ from these figures, which would produce a small difference in 1994 between the amounts of income budgeted to be received from each and the amounts eventually assessed, but this would be preferable to omitting the two Republics from the ILO scale and thus passing an additional financial burden on to other member States.

14. The Committee was now required to recommend to the Governing Body a draft scale of assessments for submission to the International Labour Conference in June 1993. The original 1992-94 UN scale of assessments approved by the General Assembly in December 1991 was revised by the General Assembly in December 1992 in respect of the 1993 and 1994 years, but it was possible that a further revision in respect of 1994 could be approved by the General Assembly late in 1993. Any such revision would however be too late for submission to the June 1993 Conference. It was also expected that in late 1994 the General Assembly would again review the UN scale and adopt a new scale of assessments to become applicable in 1995. This scale would cover the second year of the ILO's 1994-95 financial period but would not be available in June 1994 for submission to the Conference. Under these circumstances, and similar to the practice applied in earlier biennia, the Committee would normally recommend a scale for the 1994-95 financial period based upon the current revised United Nations scale. However, since further member States could join the Organization prior to the 81st (June 1994) Session of the Conference, and since definitive rates of assessment for the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic in the UN scale would not be known until late 1993, the Committee could, if it wished, recommend a draft scale of assessments for the 1994 year only, leaving itself, the Governing Body and the Conference free to decide on the 1995 scale of assessments in 1994. If the Committee decided to do so and continue the established principle of harmonizing the ILO scales of assessment with those of the UN, subject only to arithmetical differences resulting from the different membership of the two organizations, and if it also decided to include the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic in the draft scale of assessments at the provisional rates of 0.37 per cent and 0.18 per cent respectively the draft scale of assessments to be proposed for the 1994 year would be that shown in column 4 of the appendix to the paper which contained a table of the member States of the ILO at the time the paper was prepared, and showed:

Column 1 - The percentage rate of assessment of each ILO member State in the original UN scale for 1992-94 approved by the General Assembly in December 1991. These assessments totalled 100.57 per cent, due to the differences in membership between the United Nations and the ILO.

Column 2 - The ILO scale of assessments for 1993 approved by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the Conference, which was based on the original UN scale for 1992-94.

Column 3 - The percentage rate of assessment of each ILO member State for 1993 and 1994 in the revised UN scale approved by the General Assembly in December 1992. These assessments totalled 99.31 per cent, due to the differences in membership between the UN and the ILO.

Column 4 - A draft ILO scale of assessments for the 1994 year, based on the revised UN scale for 1992-1994, including the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic at provisional rates of assessment of 0.37 per cent and 0.18 per cent, and adjusted arithmetically for differences in membership, and with the maximum and minimum rates of contribution set at 25 per cent and 0.01 per cent respectively, as in the UN scale.

Column 5 - The prospective increase or decrease, as the case may be, between the percentage rates of assessment in the ILO scale for 1993 (column 2) and the draft ILO scale for the 1994 year (column 4).

15. The representative of the Government of Germany asked whether in view of the late receipt of the paper and the fact that his Government had not had an opportunity to discuss the matter, the Committee could adjourn and reconvene at a later date. As a preliminary comment, however, he observed that the ILO scale proposed for 1994 showed a 0.09 per cent increase in the contribution of Germany. When the scale of assessments totalled less than 100 per cent a better practice would be to deduct the shortfall from the total of the budget, as UNIDO had done when Canada had withdrawn from membership.

16. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that the late distribution of the paper was due to the fact that the Director-General had received communications from

Georgia and Kazakhstan applying for membership of the ILO, but as these were not in the correct form their applications could not yet be accepted. The Office had delayed issue of the paper in the hope that proper applications would be received from those two countries in time for inclusion in the draft scale of assessments for 1994 but unfortunately they had not been received by the latest possible deadline.

17. The Treasurer confirmed that the paper had been prepared according to normal practice whereby the scale was adjusted so that assessments totalled 100 per cent. The reference to the withdrawal of Canada from UNIDO was not applicable because no member State had withdrawn from the ILO and the proposed scale reflected its full membership at present. Whatever recommendation the Committee might make, there would be opportunities for comment in the Governing Body itself and later at the Conference.

18. The representative of the Government of Germany hoped that a further meeting of the Committee would be possible so that unnecessary discussion in the Governing Body or the Conference could be avoided. He reaffirmed his belief that there was a valid comparison between the ILO and UNIDO because in both cases the changes to the scales of assessment had resulted from changes in membership.

19. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom was unable to agree to the suggestion put forward by the representative of the Government of Germany that budget reductions should compensate for the scale totalling less than 100 per cent. The document before the Committee conformed to standard practice and the Committee should adopt the decision paragraph as it stood.

20. The representative of the Government of the United States observed that his Government had also received the document late, and he would support the proposal to adjourn the meeting if it did not dislocate the Governing Body's programme of meetings.

21. After a short recess the Treasurer confirmed that the Committee could reconvene on Wednesday, 26 May 1993 at 10 a.m.

22. When the Committee reconvened on 26 May, the representative of the Government of Germany said that his Government did not wish to go against the consensus already expressed in the Committee and would support the point for decision as it stood. However, in cases where the scale of assessments totalled less than 100 per cent and this shortfall resulted from changes in membership it would be preferable not to distribute the shortfall by increasing the assessment rates for member States. It would be better to meet the shortfall by budgetary reductions in line with the practice in some other organizations.

23. The representative of the Government of Canada observed that member States would normally expect to be advised of their 1994 contributions by a letter in late summer 1993. He asked what would be the effect on ILO contributions for 1994 if the UN adopted a new scale for 1994 after those letters had been despatched.

24. The Treasurer confirmed that it was only the International Labour Conference which could fix assessment rates and contributions due from member States, and for 1994 the decision of the Conference in June 1993 would be binding. If the UN adopted a new scale for 1994 late in 1993, this would be used as the basis for an ILO scale for 1995 to be considered by the Conference in June 1994. The scale being considered for recommendation to the Governing Body could be amended should new member States join the Organization during the International Labour Conference. He recalled that the Governing Body, at its previous session, had authorized the Allocations Committee to continue its work, if necessary, after the Governing Body finished its business on 29 May 1993 and to submit its report direct to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the Conference. In reply to a query, the Treasurer said that the Office had no further news regarding the status of the application of Kazakhstan and Georgia for membership, but he was very hopeful that the request for membership from those two countries would be received in the proper form either before or during the International Labour Conference.

25. The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that, in accordance with the established practice of harmonizing the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations, and assuming provisional rates of assessment of 0.37 per cent for the Czech Republic and 0.18 per cent for the Slovak Republic, it propose to the Conference the adoption of the draft scale of assessments for the 1994 year as set out in column 4 of the Appendix to this report, subject to such adjustments as might be necessary following any further change in the membership of the Organization before the Conference is called upon to adopt the recommended scale.

I. ASSESSED CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1993

[1] Assessed contributions for 1993 of the Russian Federation, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania, the Republic of Moldova and Uzbekistan – The 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference adopted a scale of assessments for the year 1993 which included the Russian Federation at a rate of assessment of 9.34 per cent. Additionally, the Conference decided that the rates of assessment for 1993 of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania, for which rates of assessment had not yet been established in the United Nations (UN), would be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the UN, and that their rates of assessment would be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation for 1993. The Conference further decided that the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other States which had formed part of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) which may become Members of the ILO before 1 January 1993 would also be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the UN, and that the total of their rates of assessment also be deducted from the rate of assessment for the Russian Federation for 1993. Armenia, the Republic of Moldova and Uzbekistan became Members of the ILO prior to 1 January 1993. The rates of assessment and the assessed contributions for the Russian Federation and the above new member States for 1993 take into account the above decisions of the Conference, and are summarized as follows:

Assessed contributions

	%	Amount	%	Amount
Original assessment of the Russian Federation			9.34	29 365 870
Less – Assessment of new member States which had previously formed part of the former USSR

[2] Slovakia – This amount represents a provisional payment against the 1993 contributions of Slovakia pending the assessment of Slovakia for 1993 by the International Labour Conference. See also note 4.

[3] Yugoslavia – The percentage and amounts shown in table 1.I.B in respect of 1993 represent the assessment made by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference on the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The forthcoming 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference will consider a proposal made by the Governing Body at its 255th (March 1993) Session that the rates of assessment for 1993 of Croatia and Slovenia be set at 0.13 per cent and 0.09 per cent respectively and that the total of their rate of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of Yugoslavia for 1993. In the event that this proposal is adopted by the Conference the 1993 assessments of Croatia and Slovenia would be 408,733 Swiss francs and 282,969 Swiss francs respectively, a total of 691,702 Swiss francs, which would be deducted from the amount shown as being assessed on Yugoslavia. Additionally, the Conference will consider a proposal by the Governing Body that the contributions of Croatia and Slovenia for the periods of their membership in 1992 be based on the same percentage rates of 0.13 per cent and 0.09 per cent respectively and that their resulting assessments for 1992 be deducted from the 1992 assessment of Yugoslavia. In the event that this proposal is adopted by the Conference the resulting assessments for Croatia and Slovenia for the periods of their membership in 1992 would be 206,600 Swiss francs and 167,771 Swiss francs, a total of 374,371 Swiss francs, which would be deducted from the arrears of contributions due from Yugoslavia included in table 1.II.B.

[4] Czechoslovakia – The percentage and amounts shown represent the assessment made by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference on the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (Czechoslovakia). Czechoslovakia ceased to exist on 31 December 1992 and the Czech Republic and Slovakia have undertaken to provisionally cover the assessment in the proportions of two-thirds and one-third respectively.

[5] Russian Federation – In a letter of 26 December 1991 addressed to the Director-General by the Permanent Mission of the Russian Federation to the United Nations Office and other international organizations in Geneva transmitting a note from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Russian Federation indicated, inter alia, that it "remains responsible in full for all rights and obligations of the USSR in the International Labour Organization including the financial obligations". The forthcoming 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference will consider a proposal made by the Governing Body at its 255th (March 1993) Session that the contributions of the eight new member States that formed part of the former USSR referred to in Note 1 above for the periods of their membership in 1991 and 1992 be based on the same assessment rates as shown in Note 1 and that the total of their resulting assessments for 1991 and 1992 be deducted from the assessments of the former USSR for those years. In the event that this proposal is adopted by the Conference, the assessments for each of the new member States for the periods of their membership in 1991 and/or 1992 would be as follows:

Azerbaijan	–	429 006	429 006
Estonia	–	212 871	212 871
Kyrgyzstan	–	142 258	142 258
Latvia	29 864	408 733	438 597
Lithuania	105 752	471 615	577 367
Moldova, Republic of	–	266 733	266 733
Uzbekistan	–	384 164	384 164
	135 616	2 355 583	2 491 199

[6] Comoros – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 70th Session (1984), the Comoros is called upon: (a) to pay in 1985 its 1985 contribution ($12,737) in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that will have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1984, amounting to $56,739, by the payment of nine equal annual instalments of $5,674 beginning in 1985 and a final instalment of $5,673. The Conference also decided at its 70th Session (1984), under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, that the Comoros should be permitted to vote. The Comoros made a payment ($5,000) on account of its 1985 annuity in 1986. The Comoros failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986. The arrears of contributions now due from the Comoros of 308,881 Swiss francs include 90,544 Swiss francs due in respect of arrears to the end of 1984 and its contributions from 1985 to 1992 amounting to 218,337 Swiss francs.

[7] Dominican Republic – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 63rd Session (1977), the Dominican Republic is called upon: (a) to pay its current contribution for the year 1977 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1976, amounting to $266,286, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $13,314 beginning in 1977 and a final instalment of $13,320. The Conference at its 65th Session (1979) decided, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, that the Dominican Republic should be permitted to vote. The Dominican Republic paid its annuities and contributions for 1977 to 1984 inclusive. The Dominican Republic failed to comply with the terms of its arrangements in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986. The arrears of contributions now due from the Dominican Republic of 932,962 Swiss francs comprise 279,603 Swiss francs due in respect of arrears to the end of 1976 and its contributions from 1985 to 1992 of 653,359 Swiss francs.

[8] Paraguay – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 78th Session (1991), Paraguay is called upon: (a) to pay in full in 1991 its contribution for the year 1991 together with its contribution due to the Working Capital Fund of the Organization of 2,625 Swiss francs; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1990, amounting in total to 1,174,753 Swiss francs, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of 58,738 Swiss francs beginning in 1991 and a final instalment of 58,731 Swiss francs. The Conference also decided at its 78th Session that Paraguay should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Paraguay has paid its contribution to the Working Capital Fund, its annuities and contributions for 1991 to 1993 and thus has the right to vote. Paraguay also owes 245,066 Swiss francs in respect of contributions to the ILO and other League of Nations organizations for the period prior to 1939. The Conference at its 45th Session (1961) decided that these arrears should be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions due since 5 September 1956, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organization.

[9] Poland – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988), Poland is called upon: (a) to pay in 1988 its contribution for the year 1988 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1987, amounting to $9,039,336, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $451,967 beginning in 1988 and a final instalment of $451,963. At its 75th Session (1998) the Conference also decided that Poland should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Poland has paid its annuities and contributions for 1988 to 1993 and thus has the right to vote. The arrears of contributions now due from Poland of 11,073,185 Swiss francs represent the balance of its consolidated arrears to the end of 1987.

[10] Romania – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 77th Session (1990), Romania is called upon: (a) to pay in full in 1990 its contribution for the year 1990; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year in which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1989 amounting in total to 2,875,816 Swiss francs by the payment of eight equal annual instalments of 359,477 Swiss francs beginning in 1990. The Conference also decided at its 77th Session (1990) that Romania should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Romania has paid its annuities and contributions for 1990 to 1992, but as its 1992 obligations were not fully settled by 31 December 1992 it lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1993. The arrears of contributions now due from Romania of 1,797,385 Swiss francs represent the balance of its consolidated arrears of contributions to the end of 1989.

[11] Chad – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 69th Session (1983), Chad is called upon: (a) to pay in 1983 its contribution for the year 1983 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1982, amounting to $122,107, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $6,105 beginning in 1984 and a final instalment of $6,112. The Conference also decided at its 69th Session (June 1983) that Chad should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution. Chad has paid its annuities and contributions for 1983 to 1992 and thus has the right to vote. The arrears of contributions due from Chad of 117,532 Swiss francs represent the balance of its consolidated arrears to the end of 1982.

First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 3 June 1993 with Mr. Y. Chotard (France) as Chairman and Reporter, and Dr. Shah M. Farid (Bangladesh) as Vice-Chairman.

REQUEST OF THE GOVERNMENT OF ROMANIA, UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION, FOR PERMISSION TO VOTE

2. The Committee had before it a request from the Government of Romania for permission to vote at the Conference. This request was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

3. The text of the request, dated 16 March 1993, is as follows:

(Translated from French)
Romania
Ministry of Labour and Social Protection
Office of the Minister

Bucharest, 16 March 1993

Mr. Director-General

I am pleased to inform you that the final instalment of Romania's contribution for 1992, Sw.Frs.195,285.00, was transferred into the International Labour Office's account at Citibank, Zurich, Switzerland on 5 February 1993. This means that once again the conditions are fulfilled to enable us to benefit from the arrangement concerning the settlement of Romania's overdue payments as approved by the International Labour Conference in June 1990, with regard to exercising the right to vote.

I would also like to inform you that in spite of the economic and financial difficulties Romania faces we are going to continue to take the steps necessary to put into place, at some time in the future, a priority system for the purchase of convertible currencies to enable us to pay the contributions resulting from our membership of the International Labour Organization in a timely fashion, as well as the remaining annual instalments.

In the light of the above and bearing in mind the fact that my country wishes to participate fully in the work of the International Labour Organization, I would like to ask you to transmit to the International Labour Conference my Government's formal request that, in accordance with Article 13, Paragraph 4, of the Organization's Constitution, Romania may once again have the right to vote for so long as it makes the payments as provided in Article 32.2 of the Standing Rules of the Conference.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) DAN MIRCEA POPESCU
Minister of State,
Minister of Labour and Social Protection

4. The Committee noted that paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization provides as follows:

> 4. A Member of the Organisation which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organisation shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee, or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

5. The Committee also noted that article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides as follows:

> Procedure where proposal is made to permit a Member in arrears to vote
> 1. Any request or proposal that the Conference should nevertheless permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution shall be referred in the first instance to the Finance Committee of the Conference, which shall report thereon as a matter of urgency.
> 2. Pending a decision on the request or proposal by the Conference, the Member shall not be entitled to vote.
> 3. The Finance Committee shall submit to the Conference a report giving its opinion on the request or proposal.
> 4. If the Finance Committee, having found that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member, thinks fit to propose to the Conference that the Member should nevertheless be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, it shall in its report –
> (a) explain the nature of the conditions beyond the Member's control;
> (b) give an analysis of the financial relations between the Member and the Organisation during the preceding ten years;
> (c) indicate the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears.
> 5. Any decision which may be taken by the Conference to permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contribution to vote notwithstanding such arrears may be made conditional upon the Member complying with any recommendations for settling the arrears which may be made by the Conference.

6. In examining the financial relations between Romania and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that the 77th Session (1990) of the Conference adopted an arrangement proposed by the Government of Romania for the settlement of arrears of contributions due for the period 1984-89 of 2,875,816 Swiss francs, made up as follows:

Years	Assessed contributions	Amounts received 1981-89	Arrears of contributions due at the end of 1989		Assessed contributions in Swiss francs	Amounts received in 1990	Arrears of contributions currently due
				Converted to Swiss francs 1 Jan. 1990
	US$	US$	US$	SFR	SFR	SFR	SFR
1981-82	295 531	—	295 531	517 180	—	517 180	—
1983	259 108	—	259 108	453 439	—	453 439	—
1984	242 007	—	242 007	423 512	—	—	423 512
1985	242 007	—	242 007	423 512	—	—	423 512
1986	240 483	—	240 483	420 845	—	—	420 845
1987	240 483	—	240 483	420 845	—	—	420 845
1988	308 617	—	308 617	540 080	—	—	540 080
1989	369 727	—	369 727	647 022	—	—	647 022
	2 197 963	—	2 197 963	3 846 435	—	970 619	2 875 816

7. The terms of the Conference arrangement were:

(a) in 1990, Romania would pay in full its contribution for the year 1990;

(b) in subsequent years Romania would continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it was due;

(c) Romania would settle the arrears that had accumulated up to and including 31 December 1989, amounting in total to 2,875,816 Swiss francs, by the payment of eight equal annual instalments of 359,477 Swiss francs, beginning in 1990.

8. Romania has settled all of its obligations for 1990 and 1991 under the terms of the Conference arrangement. At the end of 1992, Romania had paid the annuity due against its arrears for that year and 302,094 Swiss francs against its 1992 contribution of 597,379 Swiss francs, leaving a shortfall in payments against 1992 obligations of 295,285 Swiss francs. As a result, on 1 January 1993 the terms of paragraph 2 of article 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference no longer applied to Romania and it lost its right to vote in the Organization. The shortfall in 1992 has since been covered by two payments of 50,000 Swiss francs on 5 and 26 January 1993 and a payment of 195,285 Swiss francs received on 5 February 1993.

9. The representative of Romania said that for the reasons described in the document before the Committee it had not been possible in 1992 for his Government to comply with the terms of the 1990 arrangement. His country still wanted to participate fully in the work of the ILO and he hoped the Committee would be able to recommend that the plenary of the Conference grant Romania the right to vote.

10. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), in reply to a query, confirmed that Romania's obligation for the year 1992 had now been met in full. It was simply because full payment had not been received before 31 December 1992 that this matter was now before the Committee.

11. The representative of Germany thought that a slight delay in receiving amounts due under the arrangement should not be a reason to be excluded and he supported Romania's request for the right to vote.

12. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Romania to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of article 4 of paragraph 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

(a) the Committee finds that the failure of Romania to pay in full its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 3 above;

(b) the financial relations between Romania and the Organization for the preceding ten years have been set out in paragraph 6 above;

(c) the Government of Romania has paid the balance of the amounts due in 1992 on 5 February 1993, thus bringing itself up to date within the terms of the arrangement for the settlement of its arrears approved by the 77th (1990) Session of the Conference.

13. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Romania of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

14. The Committee also agreed to authorize the Chairman and Reporter to adopt on its behalf the First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, so as to expedite the consideration by the Plenary of the Conference of the request for permission to vote from the Government of Romania.

Geneva, June 1993.

(Signed) Y. Chotard,
Chairman and Reporter.

Resolution concerning the granting to Romania of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization:

Having regard to the terms of the financial arrangement adopted by the Conference at its 77th Session (1990) for the settlement of the arrears of Romania;

Having regard further to the fact that Romania has brought itself up to date within the terms of the financial arrangement by payment of the balance of the amounts due in 1992 on 5 February 1993;

Decides that Romania be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

REPORTS OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE

FIRST REPORT

Election of the Officers of the Committee

The Selection Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman:	Mr. Zuala (Government member, India)
Employers' Vice-Chairman:	Mr. M'Kaissi (Employers' member, Tunisia)
Workers' Vice-Chairman:	Mrs. Carr (Workers' member, Canada)

Discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

The Selection Committee decided that the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General would begin yesterday afternoon, Wednesday, 2 June and decided that the list of speakers would be closed on Thursday, 10 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.

Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them, in organising their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference (Appendix II).

Governing Body elections

The Selection Committee decided that the Electoral Colleges for elections to the Governing Body should meet on Wednesday, 9 June. The elections will occupy the whole day, and there will therefore be no other tripartite meetings on that day.

Electronic voting at the Conference

The Governing Body has over the past few years given consideration to the introduction of an electronic voting system at the Conference. At its 248th Session (November 1990) it decided that such a system should be introduced, and a suitable system has now been found and is expected to become operational at the present session of the Conference. The system can be used at present only during plenary sittings, but in the future it is planned to extend its use to committees.

Where a vote is conducted electronically, the same action will be performed by delegates whether the vote is by show of hands, a record vote or a secret ballot. The difference will lie in the results of the action. Where a vote by show of hands takes place, the computer system will register the identity of the delegates who have voted, and how they have voted. However, only the final voting figures are published, i.e., total votes in favour, total against, and the total number of abstentions, together with the quorum. In the case of a vote in a committee, the weighting coefficients will also be taken into account. In the case of a record vote, the difference would be that, in addition, the names of the delegates voting would be published, as required by the Standing Orders. In the case of a vote by secret ballot, the results would be the same as a vote by show of hands, the distinction lying in the fact that there will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any computer record kept of how delegates voted.

At its 256th (May 1993) Session, the Governing Body gave consideration to the implications of the introduction of electronic voting for the application of the Standing Orders. The only issues that arise concern terminology (for example, in the case of a "vote by show of hands"), and the Governing Body decided that it was premature to make terminological changes in the Standing Orders without taking account of the broader practical implications and potentialities of electronic voting in the light of sufficient experience. The present session of the Conference hence offers an opportunity to gain such experience with a view to the subsequent amendment of the Standing Orders on the basis of an assessment of the potential and practical implications of the system. The Governing Body hence decided to propose that the Conference should simply decide on an ad hoc basis to use the electronic voting system at the present session, and accordingly recommends that the Conference adopt the following decision at the beginning of its present session:

> Unless the Officers of the Conference otherwise decide for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the Plenary by means of the electronic system of voting outlined in Appendix I to this report.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the above decision.

A description of the electronic voting system is attached in Appendix I to this report.

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

As in previous years, the Selection Committee invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

(i) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the Conference, which is appended to the record of the first sitting of the Conference. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;

(ii) thereafter, the quorum will be adjusted, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account new registrations and notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference;

(iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;

(iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorized to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until its end, since important votes often take place on the last day;

(v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorize an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;

(vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorized advisers to act in their place;

(vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

(b) Punctuality

The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually - except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions - irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, representatives of each group should meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallized.

Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under Article 13.4 of the Constitution of the ILO. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications, because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under Article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed as a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes between the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by Article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that, in order to avoid such distortions, members of the Government group should not apply for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote. Should this practice, which has been maintained at all sessions of the Conference since 1987, for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting co-efficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

In accordance with Article 56, paragraph 9 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Selection Committee and its Officers recommend to the Conference that the following organizations be invited to be represented in the committees stated:

Resolutions Committee

General Confederation of Trade Unions

The Selection Committee took note that the Governing Body had authorized the Director-General to inform the organizations concerned that they may nominate one person only for each agenda item in respect of which their interest has been recognized by the Selection Committee.

Consideration of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories

On the basis of proposals submitted to it by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting for the discussion of the Appendix to the Director-General's Report dealing with the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, it being understood that speakers would have to confine their remarks at that sitting to this Appendix and that, conversely, that subject would not be discussed in the framework of the discussion on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the special sitting should be held in the afternoon of Thursday, 10 June.

In addition, the Selection Committee recommends the Conference to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the Report.

It should be recalled in this connection that, according to Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the time-limit for speeches is a matter for the Conference to decide on the proposal of its Officers. In view of experience at the special sittings held during the 77th (1990), 78th (1991) and 79th (1992) Sessions of the Conference, and in particular of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor, the Selection Committee invites the President, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate a proposal concerning the duration of speeches in the special sitting, taking due account of the number of speakers registered. For this purpose the Selection Committee has decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 6 pm on Tuesday, 8 June.

The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intended to devote a part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of his Report to drawing lessons from the special sitting.

Lastly, the Selection Committee decided that the following committees should not meet at the same time as the special sitting: Finance Committee, Resolutions Committee, Committee on Apartheid.

Eighth African Regional Conference: minimum timetable

At its 252nd Session the Governing Body approved a number of reforms in the procedure of regional conferences, based on the conclusions drawn from the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference regarding the timetable and procedures. On the proposal of the Governing Body, at its 79th (1992) Session the Conference accordingly adopted a resolution providing for an interim procedural reform concerning the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO (Caracas, December 1992). In the same vein, at its 256th Session (May 1993) the Governing Body decided to propose the following draft resolution to the Conference at its present session:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference and the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to continue the experimental procedure for the Eighth African Regional Conference and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences Convened by the International Labour Organization, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a possible revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorizes the Eighth African Regional Conference, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules:

(a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;

(b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3 of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;

(c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;

(d) to authorize, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;

(e) to suspend the requirement that reports on technical items of the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with the other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;

(f) to reduce the time-limit for addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes.

As this resolution has already been examined in detail by the Governing Body, the Selection Committee refers the above resolution direct to the Conference for adoption.

Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Officers of the Selection Committee, on behalf of the Committee, propose to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member:	Mr. Ausman (Canada)
Employers' member:	Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina)
Workers' member:	Mr. Gray (United States)

Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Officers of the Selection Committee, on behalf of the Committee, recommend that, in accordance with the provisions of Article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference
The Secretary-General of the Conference
Mr. Maupain, Legal Adviser of the Conference
Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Director of the International Labour Standards Department
Mr. Devlin, Assistant to the Legal Adviser of the Conference

Request for representation at the Conference submitted by an intergovernmental organization

The Officers of the Selection Committee, on the Committee's behalf, recommend to the Conference that the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment should be invited to be represented at the 80th Session of the Conference, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 3(b) of the Conference Standing Orders.

Changes in the composition of committees

The Officers of the Selection Committee, on behalf of the Committee, recommend that the Conference approve the changes in the composition of committees attached in Appendix III. The full lists of the composition of committees are given in Appendix IV, which take account of these changes.

Geneva, 2 June 1993.

APPENDIX I

Description of the electronic voting system

The electronic system provides for votes (in most cases: yes, no, abstention) to be expressed by means of a keyboard on a "voting station" that will be made available to all delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf.

Where the electronic system is used, the subject and question to be voted on will be displayed, as well as the nature of the vote (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) and the President or Chairman will announce the beginning of the vote. After the President or Chairman has made sure that all delegates have been given sufficient opportunity to record their vote in one of the voting stations available to them, the President or Chairman will announce the closure of the vote.

Where the method of vote is by show of hands, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Where a record vote is taken, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

In the case of a secret ballot, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any record of how the delegates have voted.

It is important that, as at present, delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized. whether made by the delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. Such specific authorizations must reach to secretariat before the opening of voting is announced.

International Labour Conference

First sitting

Wednesday, 2 June 1993, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr Vargos Campos, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr Abdel-Hak

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Original Spanish: Mr. VARGAS CAMPOS (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – It is with great pleasure that I welcome to this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference all the distinguished delegates representing member States and, in particular, those who in the course of recent months have joined the International Labour Organization; the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations, the representatives of the observer States, the representatives of the intergovernmental international organizations and those of the non-governmental international organizations.

Once again, the International Labour Conference begins its work against the background of sweeping changes which continue to develop throughout the world. Once again, the eyes of the world of labour are turned to this august assembly where we will discuss fundamental aspects of social policy which certainly will contribute to the search for solutions to the problems of humanity.

In addition to the traditional subjects with which this assembly deals, the Report of the Governing Body, the Report of the Director-General, the Programme and Budget, information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Special Report on Action against Apartheid and the Report on the Arab Occupied Territories, the International Labour Conference will also examine, in a second discussion, the prevention of major industrial accidents, part-time work, in a first discussion, and at the level of a general discussion, the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

These topics highlight the importance of our reflections within this world assembly of labour and, in particular, our debates on the Director-General's Report on social insurance and social protection in the member States, which will reflect, no doubt, some of the concerns of the member States, and of the social partners on this very important subject.

As to the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, this subject will certainly bring new ideas as to how the ILO can give a more adequate response to the needs of member States in this world of rapid transformation.

The ILO has to transform itself, but without change to its permanent values.

A sign of this permanence is, among other things, the faithful and constant presence of some delegates at this Conference or members of the Governing Body and other bodies of the Organization. Here I should like to point out the case of Mr. Alfonso Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate from Mexico for more than four decades, Worker member of the Governing Body also for more than 40 years, and who is therefore the dean of that body and probably of the Conference itself. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to pay sincere tribute to him for his devotion to our Organization and for his unswerving commitment to its values.

The ILO has to respond to the vertiginous changes that are besetting the world. There have been periods of unprecendented economic expansion but we are now going through a period of recession the negative effects of which have had a direct and immediate impact on the workers. The period in which the State advocated and carried out unlimited interventionism is now being followed by an entire process of economic restructuring or changes from a planned economy to a market economy. All these phenomena have had repercussions on the workers, including the disappearance of jobs and the growing appearance of an informal sector in many countries.

These new phenomena require new attitudes and new action. The ILO, whose fundamental mandate is spelled out in the Preamble of its Constitution and reiterated in the Declaration of Philadelphia has the obligation to undertake every effort together with the representatives of the member States, the Employers and the Workers, to find new and appropriate responses to the problems facing the world of labour to preserve universal and permanent peace through the effective promotion of social justice.

Times may change, economic phenomena may take various forms, and the same is true of social claims; none the less, the basic principle which inspires our Organization, that of social justice, is such that it continues to be valid as long as poverty exists, as long as people suffer privation, inadequate conditions of work and a lack of satisfactory wages, a lack of full freedom to exercise the right to organize and to collective bargaining, the lack of a comprehensive system of social security and protection.

I consider that the adhesion of new member States, Moldova, the Republic of Croatia, Uzbekistan, Armenia, Slovakia, the Czech Republic, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Kazakhstan, is not only significant in itself but confirms the universal vocation of our Organization. In welcoming these new member States, I take the liberty of appealing to each of these Members to contribute to the attainment of the objectives of the ILO.

On the eve of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the creation of our Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadephia and with the clear proof in hand that the efforts of the ILO are aimed at improving the conditions of life and of work of the workers, we should reflect on the fact that there is still a very long path before us, since in some parts of the world the situation is so critical that the issue is one of hunger and survival in conditions that are extremely difficult under a sky of bronze and a ground of lead. For that reason, we must confront, in all serenity and patience but with audacity and with courage, the challenge before us in the new century ahead: the construction of a humane world in unity, social justice and freedom.

It is incumbent on me thus to declare open this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and at the same time I wish to express my very sincere wishes for the success of the work of the Conference.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Original Spanish: Mr. VARGAS CAMPOS (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The next item on our agenda for this morning is the election of the President of the Conference. I would like to invite Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, to present to us the candidate for the presidency of this Conference. The Minister of Labour of Uganda now has the floor.

Mr. EJALU (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda) – It's a great honour to me and my country, on behalf of the African group, to nominate a distinguished son of Africa for the presidency of this session: the Minister of Manpower and Training of the Arab Republic of Egypt, His Excellency, Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak.

In proposing the Minister of Manpower and Training of Egypt, the African group has taken several factors into account. First of all, history was made this year. For the first time, the OAU Labour Commission became a truly tripartite organ, and therefore it is not only African governments but the workers and employers of Africa as well who are nominating this candidate.

Mr. Abdel-Hak was born at the eve of the Second World War. He therefore has lived through the rough and tumble of man-made problems and has matured over the years. He is a distinguished scholar who studied accountancy and holds a Master's degree in industrial relations. He has served as a professional accountant for over 20 years. He has been a trade unionist at national and international level, serving in his country as Vice-Chairman of the General Trade Union of Textile Workers, and sitting on the various major boards in the trade union movement.

In his cultural activities he has excelled as a member of the High Council for Human Resources Development and Chief of Manpower Planning and Vocational Training in that Council. More relevant to the theme of this year's meeting, he is a member of the Board of Directors of the Social Fund for Development. As regards his political activities, he is a member of the general secretariat of the National Democratic Party. He has participated in many political training courses since 1966. He has been Deputy Director of the Workers' University, where he has also lectured and participated in studies concerning the development of labour legislation and trade union legislation, with a view to enhancing the welfare and protection of workers and the trade union movement. He has also been a member of the Board of Directors of the National Council for Childhood and Motherhood. He has had a very sobering experience as a member of the Board of Directors of the National Council for Combating and Treating Addiction.

The candidate Africa is presenting is the current Coordinator and Chairman of the OAU Labour Commission. He has also been Chairman of the Arab Labour Conference.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – It is my honour, on behalf of the Employers' group, to lend my support to the candidacy of Mr Abdel-Hak to the presidency of our Conference.

I will not go into the details of his rich professional and political experience, which has already been described by the representative of the Government group of Africa. I would simply like to highlight his great experience in the fields of labour and vocational training, to which he has attached great importance on both a national level, in Egypt, and an international level, in particular in the context of the Arab Labour Conference and the Labour Commission of the Organization of African Unity.

I think that in the person of Mr Abdel-Hak we shall have a president who has great experience in this kind of conference, both nationally and internationally; a man who is also extremely competent in the field of labour, and somebody who above all has the authority to ensure the success of our work. Indeed we have a lot of work ahead of us, as has been pointed out quite correctly by the Chairman of the Governing Body.

On behalf of the Employers' group, I ask you to support the candidacy of Mr Abdel-Hak, Minister of Manpower and Training of Egypt.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada) – It certainly is a great pleasure for me, on behalf of the workers from all around the world who are here, to second the nomination of Mr. Abdel-Hak, Minister of Manpower and Training of the Arab Republic of Egypt.

It is a special pleasure to support his candidature in this very Palais of the United Nations Organization of which his distinguished compatriot, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, is presently the Secretary-General. Moreover, Mr. Abdel-Hak has been a trade unionist at the local and national level, and a member of the Board of Directors of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation; he has participated in studies concerning development of labour legislation and trade union legislation to improve the welfare and protection of workers and the trade union movement. Along with the fact that he has participated in the International Labour Conference since 1983, these qualifications will stand him in good stead as President of this session of the Conference.

We support the nomination and we look forward to working with him over the next few years. It will indeed be a great pleasure. I hope that all of you will support the nomination put forward.

Mr. WESTON (Government delegate, United Kingdom) – It is my privilege and pleasure to second this proposal. The qualities, skills and experience of His Excellency Asem Abdel-Hak Saleh have already een fully and eloquently explained to you by the roposer and by previous speakers.

I would like warmly to endorse, on behalf of my wn Government and of the Western European roup as a whole, his credentials for this particular nd important post. We would particularly like to tress the value of his experience in the manpower nd training field. We are certain that he is excepionally well qualified to chair our proceedings and hus we are sure that he will in fact preside over all ur deliberations with great skill, authority and wislom. I call on you therefore to support his nomiation and wish him every success in his crucial role.

Original French: Mr. NEAGU (Ambassador; Pernanent Representative of Romania in Geneva) – On ehalf of the government delegations of the Eastern uropean regional group, I have the honour and leasure of seconding the nomination of His Excelency Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak, the Minister of Manower and Training of Egypt, for the post of Presilent of the 80th Session of the International Labour onference. Without any doubt, in light of the comlex and topical problems that we have on the genda and the specific methods to be used to deal vith them, this Conference is one of the major vents of the year both nationally for the member tates of the International Labour Organization and lso for the international community as a whole. We re convinced that the African countries have made n excellent choice in the person of the Minister of anpower and Training of Egypt. He has a very fine ecord of experience acquired thanks to his direct, igh-level involvement in the trade union organizaions and government bodies of his country and also hrough his constant participation since 1983 in the essions of the International Labour Conference. All f these qualities will allow His Excellency Mr. Asem bdel-Hak to make a top-quality contribution to the unctioning of this session of the Conference and to he successful conclusion of its work. We would like o wish him the best of success in accomplishing this oble task and also to assure him of the constant and onstructive cooperation of the government delegaions of the countries of Eastern Europe. Our overnments are very much interested in ensuring hat the activities of the ILO, this unique tripartite rganization with a special mandate in the field of abour and social affairs, be crowned with success, hus helping consolidate the advance of democracy nd creating an atmosphere conducive to the reation of wealth and jobs.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of abour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – n the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciul! It is a great honour and pleasure to address the pening meeting of the 80th Session on behalf of the sian group and to support the nomination of my riend and colleague, Asem Abdel-Hak, Minister of anpower and Training of the Arab Republic of gypt, to the presidency of the 80th Session of the nternational Labour Conference. The capabilities nd extensive practical experience of my colleague nd his wide ranging knowledge make him an emiently suitable candidate to steer the discussions of his important Conference. Many delegates attendng this Conference know him very well and can fully estify to his ability, patience, tolerance, and broad vision. He has chaired many meetings both at national and at Arab and African levels, performing his duties efficiently and impartially and contributing to the successful outcome of all the activities with which he has been involved.

Distinguished delegates, on behalf of the Asian group, which extends from Western Asia to the Pacific, and whose member countries have strong ties with Egypt, may I say that a representative of Egypt is the ideal candidate for this post. On behalf of all the Asian countries, we support the nomination of Mr Abdel-Hak and we are confident that this Conference under his wise leadership will achieve positive results. I would like to wish him every success in carrying out his duties.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL KHALIL (Minister of Labour of the Syrian Arab Republic) – The tripartite group of the Arab States has entrusted me with the pleasant duty of seconding the candidature of Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak, the Minister of Manpower and Training from Egypt, to occupy this important post of President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is obvious that the Arab group approves of this choice. We are extremely satisfied that the African group has made this judicious choice for this very important session, and would like to congratulate them thereon. We welcome very warmly this candidature because of the qualities, competence and experience of Mr. Abdel-Hak at the country level, the regional level and the international level, especially as far as industrial relations are concerned. He has participated with success in many Arab and African conferences, as well as international conferences. His status is very well known in his own country, Egypt, because he is one of the pioneers on labour matters, in both theory and in practice. During his term of office the Ministry of Manpower has undertaken a lot. In addition to all these reasons are his personal qualities. All this therefore augers well for this session. We are sure that we have entrusted our matters to very competent hands.

Mr. VARGAS CAMPOS (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The candidacy of Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak, Minister of Manpower and Training of Egypt, has been duly proposed and seconded for the presidency of this session of the Conference. In the absence of any other nominations, I declare Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak to be elected President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference: I should like to congratulate him very warmly and invite him to take the chair.

(Mr. ABDEL-HAK, Minister of Manpower and Training of Egypt, is elected President of the Conference and takes the President's chair.)

Presidential Address

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.

I would like to express my sincere thanks to all the delegations for electing me to the Presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. My election is not only a personal honour but also a reflection of your high appreciation for the people and Government of Egypt and of Africa as a whole – Africa which nominated me for the Presidency. Indeed, it is a great honour for Egypt, which was one of the first member States of the ILO, and which has worked hard ever since to further the Organization's cause. I would like also to extend my sincere thanks to all those who nominated me for the post, and in particular I would like to mention His Excellency Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, Mr. Oechslin, Chairman of the Employers' group, Mrs. Carr, Chairwoman of the Workers' group, Mr. Weston, Government representative of the United Kingdom, on behalf of the Western European group, Mr. Neagu of Romania on behalf of the Eastern European group, Mr. Al-Jarwan of the United Arab Emirates on behalf of Asia, and his Excellency Mr. Aly Khalil of the Syrian Arab Republic, on behalf of the Arab group. I would like also to extend my thanks to all the representatives of the various regional groups for supporting this nomination.

From this rostrum I would like to greet and congratulate the distinguished representatives of the new member States of Armenia, Ukraine, the Czech Republic, the State of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Korea, the Slovak Republic, and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and thank them for their support. This support places a great burden on me and I promise you that I will spare no efforts in carrying out my responsibilities. I am also confident that your support and cooperation will fully guarantee the success of the proceedings of this session.

A few weeks ago I attended two important conferences. The first was the Arab Labour Conference in Amman and the second African Labour Conference which Egypt had the honour of hosting in Cairo. There is no doubt in my mind that the outcome of these two conferences and other regional meetings will contribute to the work of this session of the International Labour Conference.

I would not be exaggerating if I said that the 80th Session of the Conference is taking place at a historically critical and dangerous period of time. The future of mankind in the twenty-first century will to a large extent depend on the international community represented by various forums, including this Conference. The great challenges before us are to my mind four in number.

The first and biggest of all these challenges is how to bring about changes in a world torn by wars, regional blocs and pacts and narrow and intolerant views, changes which will enable mankind to achieve the common goal of putting an end to the economic recession and securing the welfare of all.

The 1980s have been called the lost decade, with the slowdown in development in countries dependent on the agricultural sector and recession and unemployment in the more advanced. However, we should not forget that the 1980s were also an era of historical change and victory for democracy in many parts of the world.

The question that arises here is how we can promote this democractic wave on the international scene to combat unemployment and poverty. Combating both is our guarantee for lasting peace in the world. What the Secretary-General of the United Nations has rightly called the "agenda for peace" should be complemented by another call for an agenda for development, the first item of which would be the establishment of prosperity in the world – east, west, north and south. The language of dialogue, the language of cooperation and not confrontation that should prevail in relations amongst nations so that a new world order would prevail – a world order that makes clear to all that prosperity is closely linked to progress everywhere and that global poverty can be a real and serious threat to global prosperity.

The second challenge confronting us is how to meet the requirements of change with courage and liberalism. We are living in the shadow of a world economy which makes it imperative to play a major role if the wheel of development is to be kept in full swing. The great technological advance which has been called the fourth industrial revolution, as well as the changes between the three elements of production – workers, employers and governments – make it imperative to devise new ways of liberalizing international trade and organizing labour relations. It is equally imperative to adopt a new approach towards providing more work opportunities, enhancing employment and containing unemployment.

Several studies have agreed that unemployment will continue to persist even with the most optimistic estimates of higher growth rates. The question that arises again here is how we can reorganize society and reorganize work so that we do not see people without work or people who have to work night and day. In other words, we have to ensure that everybody has the opportunity to work in a way which is consonant with economic growth in the world.

The third challenge we have to face, which is of paramount importance to developing countries, is how to employ structural adjustment programmes to serve the cause of growth and social justice. The experience of what is known as the first generation of structural adjustment has given us important lessons on how to devise a second generation of such programmes that will serve the cause of growth and justice at the same time. The prerequisite of balance at the macroeconomic level or in balance of payments or budgets should take into account social elements, especially those related to manpower, and, if structural adjustment programmes take longer than expected, we should remember that the progressive implementation of economic adjustment programmes is much better than applying a shock treatment. Social reform should go side by side with economic reform.

The new challenges facing us will depend to a large extent on the skills required by the workforce and in this respect I would like to renew the call made by President Mubarak from this rostrum in 1983 when he called for a concerted international effort to enhance the ability of developing countries to improve workers' skills. This is now imperative and the ILO should spare no effort in this direction.

The fourth challenge we are facing is how to achieve a balance between the role of the State and the market mechanism and the society represented by its democratic institutions. There has been much talk about this issue and it is unfortunate that some believe that the path to progress is dependent on the sovereignty of the role of the State. Others believe that the path to progress is dependent solely on the sovereignty of market mechanisms. But human experience shows that there is a need to seek a new formula to strike a balance between the role of the State and the role of the market. Regardless of this formula the only guarantee for progress is the sovereignty of democracy and human rights. One of the prerequisites of democracy is to maintain a bottom line of development so that democratic practices are soundly respected.

These are the challenges which, I believe, confront us all at the threshold of the twenty-first century. A hard look at these challenges shows the important role which this Organization can play. I would go further and say that the role of the ILO in the forthcoming years will be more important than at any other time since its establishment.

Seventy-five years have gone by since this Organization saw the light and 50 years have passed since the Declaration of Philadelphia. The observance of these anniversaries should not be confined to celebrations and exchanges of congratulations despite the fact that this Organization has every right to be proud of what it has achieved. We should rather use this opportunity to review what we have accomplished and to draw on the lessons of the past to lay the foundations of a new future. I hope that our Conference, at its 80th Session, will engage in such a review process and will have the courage to examine the whole question of the ILO's role in the twenty-first century.

It gives me great pleasure to note that the Organization remains under the wise and prudent leadership of Mr. Michel Hansenne, and I should like to congratulate him, on your behalf of course, on his second term of office. This Organization has embarked on a process of reform since Mr. Hansenne assumed office. This process, decided on by the Governing Body, represents the right response to the requirements of change. The Director-General has taken part in every phase, keeping us informed of developments, and has had the courage and the farsightedness to map out the path that the Organization will follow. This active participation, which makes the constituents fully aware of what is going forward in the Organization, together with the budget proposals for 1994-95 show us clearly that we are proceeding in the right direction. In this connection I should like to praise the excellent report prepared for our Conference on The role of the ILO in technical cooperation. It is a subject of special importance to the developing countries and the report paints a new picture of the relationship between technical cooperation and international labour standards, a relationship that is very positive and is bound to contribute to economic and social development by placing greater emphasis on technical cooperation.

The ILO has an effective role to play in restructuring the organizations of the United Nations system so that they meet the requirements of the present era. I am very proud to see our Organization playing a pioneering role in a number of highly important forthcoming meetings, in particular the International Conference on Population and Development, the Fourth World Conference on Women, the World Summit for Social Development, the World Conference on Human Rights and the International Year for the World's Indigenous People.

I am sure you have noticed that my speech has concentrated on the future, a future that I am trying to visualize, thinking out loud with you on how our Organization may best respond to the challenges of the future. I am well aware of the scale of the problems still besetting the world and impeding our progress. A quick glance at the map of the world shows us so many negative situations and trends, for example poverty, which is subjugating more than 1 billion people; hundreds of indigenous peoples who are demanding their legitimate cultural and social rights; a million refugees calling for help; growing regional conflicts, the upsurge in narrow-minded fundamentalism, and religious trends that are threatening security, peace and social justice; the victims of racism which still rears its ugly head; and, finally, the suffering of peoples who are still subject to foreign occupation, peoples who are working hard to enforce their rights to self-determination and freedom. From this rostrum I should like to praise all the sincere efforts being made to bring about peace, and I appeal to all concerned to make the ILO a forum for understanding and cooperation on all these issues in an atmosphere of justice and legitimacy.

Allow me to conclude by wishing you all every success in your dedicated efforts and cooperation.

CONSTITUTION AND COMPOSITION OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – May we now proceed to the next item on the agenda, that is the constitution and composition of the different committees of the Conference.

In accordance with the amendments adopted by the Conference at its last session, the Conference may wish to set up the following committees: the Selection Committee, the Finance Committee, Committee on the Application of Standards, Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Accidents, Committee on Part-Time Work, Committee on Technical Cooperation, Resolutions Committee, Standing Orders Committee and the Committee on Action against Apartheid. In this regard I wish to point out that in accordance with the established practice the groups have agreed that the Committee on Action against Apartheid, should as at previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from each group and meet for a maximum of six sittings. Could I ask whether there are any observations or any objections? Consequently all of these proposals have been adopted by the Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.30 a.m.)

Second sitting

Wednesday, 2 June 1993, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Abdel-Hak

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda for this afternoon's sitting is the presentation of the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference. I give the floor to Mr. Vargas Campos, Chairman of the Governing Body, for the submission of his report.

Original Spanish: Mr. VARGAS CAMPOS (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, it is my honour and pleasure to submit to you the report that the Governing Body submits each year to the Conference. This report, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3, deals with the work performed by the Governing Body at the session which immediately followed last year's session of the Conference, and at the Governing Body's 254th and 255th Sessions, held respectively in November 1992 and in February-March 1993. As the 256th (May 1993) Session ended only last Friday, the printed document which you have before you does not cover its proceedings. Hence, in accordance with the usual practice, I shall supplement it with a concise account of the decisions and debates at that session. Despite its brevity, the May Session turned out to be extremely fruitful; a number of major decisions were adopted which will have a great influence on the work of our Organization in the next few years.

The first item on its agenda was the appointment of the Director-General. On Thursday, 27 May 1993, the Governing Body re-elected Mr. Michel Hansenne as Director-General for a period of five years, starting in March 1994, upon the expiry of his present term of office. In this way the Governing Body expressed its full confidence in Mr. Hansenne to carry out, in close cooperation with the new Governing Body that you will elect at this session of the Conference, the various major reforms that are being introduced in the structure and activities of the ILO, in particular the active partnership policy, which is aimed at bringing the ILO closer to its constituents in all regions of the world.

These reforms will also affect the work of the Conference and of the Governing Body, as recommended by the Working Party established by the Governing Body. The recommendations formulated by the Governing Body to reorganize the Conference's work (described in paragraphs 22 to 24 and also in Appendix II of the written report before you), will come into force in June 1994, provided that the Conference adopts them at its present session. The same Working Party was entrusted with the task of examining the progress achieved in the work of the Governing Body itself. The Working Party reached an agreement on a number of far-reaching reforms that should be made to the work of the Governing Body, which the latter unanimously adopted a few days ago.

These reforms concern the following: (a) the frequency and timing of Governing Body sessions; (b) the restructuring of Governing Body committees; (c) the procedure for adopting the reports of Governing Body committees; (d) the procedure for determining the agenda of the Conference; and (e) the role of the Officers of the Governing Body. In this connection, the Governing Body decided to abolish its annual May Session so that its work will be divided between an autumn session (November), and a spring session (March). However, the Committee on Freedom of Association will meet in May and its report will be adopted by the Governing Body during the short meeting that the Governing Body holds after the Conference in June. As regards the structure of Governing Body committees, it was decided to abolish the standing committees, except the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, and to redistribute their work among four new committees of greater scope which would be responsible, respectively, for: (1) legal matters and international labour standards; (2) employment and social policy; (3) technical cooperation; and (4) sectoral, technical and regional meetings and related issues. There will be special provisions in respect of the procedure for the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, and it will be possible to examine in smaller working parties specific matters connected with relations between the ILO and other United Nations agencies. Apart from a few specific exceptions, the Governing Body will generally adopt the reports of its committees without any introduction or additional discussion so as to avoid a double discussion. Regarding the procedure for determining the Conference's agenda, the Governing Body decided to maintain the present practice, which consists in studying the items which might go on the agenda at two consecutive meetings of the Governing Body. But it also decided to amend the nature and length of the debates. Specifically, the Conference's agenda will have to be decided upon at the spring session (in other words, 27 months in advance, instead of the present 18 months), which will give both ILO constituents and the Office itself much more time to carry out the necessary preparations. Finally, with a view to lightening its own workload, the Governing Body, decided to delegate to its Officers the authority to take decisions on some routine matters.

These reforms will take effect as from the 258th (November 1993) Session, and the new Governing Body will be invited at its 257th Session, in other words the session immediately following this session of the Conference, to set up the new standing committees. Although it may be appropriate to adjust the new methods of work of the Governing Body in the light of experience, these reforms will tend to systematize the work of the Governing Body and enable it to carry out with greater efficiency its essential tasks of programming and guidance, as well as managing and supervising the Organization's programmes, the use of the ILO's resources and the Office's work.

In line with established practice, the Governing Body gave preliminary consideration to proposals for the agenda of the 82nd (1995) Session of the Conference, on which it will be required to take a final decision next November.

Following an exchange of views, the Governing Body decided to request the Office to submit law and practice reports or more detailed proposals for the following six items:

(1) protection of workers' personal data;

(2) homework;

(3) extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector;

(4) revision of the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), and of the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95);

(5) an addition to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), adding a new instrument prepared in the light of the work of the Governing Body Committee on Employment and with special reference to the role of training and the importance of rural employment; and

(6) contract labour.

Some items which were examined have been transmitted by the Governing Body to the relevant Conference committees. For example, the various decisions adopted by the Governing Body at the recommendation of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee will be examined at the Conference by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. Since this is a budget year, one of the main tasks of the Conference will be to approve the Programme and Budget of the ILO for 1994-95. In due course I shall submit to the Finance Committee the proposals that the Governing Body adopted at its 255th (February-March 1993) Session.

The Governing Body considered and adopted at its recent 256th Session four reports from its Committee on Freedom of Association. This Committee, which from the time it was set up has examined more than 1,700 complaints concerning violations of trade union rights and freedom of association, remains one of the pillars of the ILO machinery for the defence of human rights, a subject which continues to draw international attention, as evidenced by the World Conference on Human Rights, which will be held this month in Vienna.

In accordance with the ILO's special constitutional procedure to examine complaints and representations regarding the application of its Conventions, the Governing Body studied the report of the Committee which it had decided to establish to examine the representation submitted by the International Organization of Employers and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Manufacturers' Associations (FEDECAMARAS), which alleged that Venezuela had not applied Conventions Nos. 4, 81, 87, 88, 95, 98, 100, 111, 143, 144 and 158. The Governing Body adopted the Committee's conclusions and recommendations and declared closed the proceedings against the Government of Venezuela.

The Governing Body, through its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, examined the procedural aspects of the electronic voting system which is being introduced at this session of the Conference, and also an advisory opinion of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on the competence to ratify the ILO's Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170), and an Office document concerning article 37(2) of the ILO Constitution and the interpretation of international labour Conventions. The Governing Body also examined and adopted the recommendations of its Committee on Discrimination and of the Working Party on the World Summit for Social Development.

May I now share with you some thoughts of a general nature on the Governing Body's debates, activities and decisions. These reflections also spring from developments in the work of the International Labour Office which, as the Chairman of the Governing Body, I have been able to follow with great attention and interest.

I am quite convinced – and I think this opinion is shared by the members of the Governing Body – that the work of the Governing Body in 1992-93 has marked a milestone in the life of the International Labour Organization. The reasons are to be found in the decisions adopted by the Governing Body, some of which I have just informed you of orally and others of which you can find in Provisional Record No. 3, which contains the report of the Governing Body.

I am sure that after this session of the Conference nothing will be the same, whether at the International Labour Conference, at the Governing Body or in the International Labour Office. In extending the term of office of the Director-General for a new period of five years, and in adopting the programme and budget proposals which will be submitted to this Conference for approval, the Governing Body is giving the International Labour Organization the instruments it needs to carry out its activities in the short, medium and long term, as well as a new impetus for the twenty-first century.

For this purpose the Organization has had to establish a new policy, that of active partnership, and concomitantly to set up multidisciplinary teams; it has also had to engage in a thorough reflection on new topics originating in social, economic and political events such as the repercussions of structural adjustment on employment and on the working and living conditions of workers, the appearance in national economies of a growing informal sector, and the need to improve and extend social security and social protection.

This last topic was on the agenda of the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO. Thanks to the debate that took place there, and given the importance of the issue, the Governing Body decided to call a meeting of experts from the Americas region which will take place in Mexico later this year.

The Director-General chose social security and social protection as the subject of his report to this session of the Conference.

The events that I have described reflect a deep concern for one of the most important aspects of workers' lives, in particular, and in general, for the lives of all members of society. This is because social security and social protection are perhaps the broadest expression of efforts to promote social justice in a constantly changing world.

Although it may appear repetitive, I do not think I am exaggerating in saying that, in a world that is experiencing breathtaking changes – where we no longer see the State as capable of solving all problems, where we are shifting away from planned economies to new systems of open markets, and hence providing less protection for the disadvantaged groups – the need to pursue the principle of social justice should be the aspiration of all who participate in the work of the ILO. From this point of view I repeat that the ILO is called upon to play an extremely important role in the search for a balance between economic efficiency and social justice, all the more so now that the solutions advocated in other international forums target economic efficiency without much concern for social issues.

It is true that there are no universal models for achieving the establishment of a market economy with certain minimum social programmes that will promote equity, freedom with social justice and social liberalism.

Each country, according to its particular political, economic and social conditions, and in conformity with its historical traditions and legislative structures, must find the specific formulas which will contribute to achieving social justice, and which will ensure that the measures adopted to restructure or transform economies will not deprive large sections of the population of minimum levels of protection and of social security.

In the search for such formulas the instrument that should be used is tripartite dialogue – a fundamental pillar of our Organization. Without tripartite dialogue or agreement any plan adopted will lack the necessary basis for achieving success.

I am quite convinced that social justice should lead to a better and more equitable distribution of national wealth, and consequently, that social justice, as the fundamental objective of any social policy (and in the case of the ILO, as its very raison d'être), is the essential undertaking towards which all efforts should point.

Before concluding, I would like to express my most sincere thanks to my colleagues and fellow officers of the Governing Body, Mr. Jean-Jacques Oechslin, Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mrs. Shirley Carr, Worker Vice-Chairwoman, for the valuable and friendly cooperation that they have given me in the past year and which has considerably facilitated the task of directing the work of the Governing Body. I would also like to thank the Director-General and his staff for the constant support and assistance that they have given to the Officers of the Governing Body as a whole. My warmest congratulations to you, Mr. President, on your election. I wish you every success in your work and the work of the Conference.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Allow me to extend my sincere thanks to the Chairman of the Governing Body for his excellent presentation.

Allow me, before opening the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I would like first of all to make the following statement on behalf of the Officers of the Conference.

This statement refers to the way in which we intend to discharge our duties and I am making it on behalf of all the Officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles we propose to apply in guiding this discussion. These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches and all speakers. Our guiding principles were first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and put before the International Labour Conference in 1967. They are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of the report of the Working Party and can be found in the Memorandum of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure you all have copies of this document by now. It is incumbent upon the Officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to the contents of paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued cooperation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the International Labour Conference has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them".

It is my duty to draw the Conference's attention to these principles, and in full agreement with my fellow Officers and on behalf of all of you I urge all delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognize that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. Both myself and my colleagues are determined to ensure compliance with those principles. Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organization. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried on in an appropriate way and be crowned with success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected and the Officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular, if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about any Head of State or Government or if personal insults are directed at any other delegate, the President will intervene immediately.

At the Conference, all delegates should use parliamentary language, and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the items under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What he should do is to inform the President of the sitting before that sitting finishes that he wishes to exercise his right to reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the Officers during the sitting in which the government or delegation considers that it should exercise its right of reply. These requests should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk and not by asking for the floor during the sitting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise of the right of reply. The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceed two minutes and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be presented in correct and parliamentary language.

Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debate, it has been a practice of the Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

I wish furthermore to point out that in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference as amended by the Conference at its 79th Session, the time limit for speeches of delegates participating in the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General should not exceed ten minutes. I therefore invite all delegates to concentrate their remarks on these two Reports alone.

The time available to the Conference for the examination of its agenda being very short, it is imperative that these provisions be strictly respected.

All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take into account in preparing their remarks this limit of ten minutes so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from a speaker before he has finished his or her speech.

May I remind you that in accordance with the established practice the Officers and President organize the general discussion. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure the respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

Concerning the special sitting on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories, may I remind you that on the proposal of the Selection Committee, the Conference has decided to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the general report and during the general sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the report. May I recall in that respect that it has been decided to close the list of speakers for the special sitting at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 8 June 1993.

Finally, it goes without saying that all the principles mentioned above also apply to the special sitting, except the time limit for speeches which depending on the number of speakers, may be less than ten minutes. With your help and collaboration, I am sure we shall fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred upon us, with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and success of the Conference and I thank you in advance for your understanding.

Mrs. CHITAURO (Government delegate, Zimbabwe) – Allow me on behalf of the Zimbabwean delegation to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their being elected unanimously to preside over this session of the Conference. I wish to express our confidence in them as well as assure them of our utmost cooperation as they guide the proceedings of the Conference.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General and his staff for producing analytical, comprehensive and informative reports and other working documents which will no doubt facilitate the work of the Conference.

My delegation is pleased with the ILO activities focusing on regional technical programmes. We in Zimbabwe have benefited a lot from the ILO assistance in many respects and would like to express our appreciation of the ILO's efforts in contributing to our economic development, particularly through the provision of technical expertise for various programmes in training, labour administration, social security, rehabilitation, factory inspection and employment promotion, to name but a few.

ARLAC, a Pan African institution for training, research and information, has become a centre of excellence in Africa. Training in professional and policy matters pertaining to labour administration has been conducted with very high standards. Zimbabwe has fulfilled its obligation towards the establishment and development of the centre. The ILO's continued support in consolidating this excellent enterprise is of paramount importance to us.

The Director-General's policy to streamline the ILO's technical capacity in the field by the establishment of five multidisciplinary advisory teams (MDTs) in Africa should be commended. The MDTs will go a long way in assisting and strengthening national capacity for effective employment-oriented and human resources development planning, in promoting equality of access to employment, training and socio-economic opportunities, in reducing income inequalities and wide disparities in working conditions and living standards between different socio-economic and population groups, and in assisting trade unions in collective bargaining and other aspects of industrial relations. The activities of the team will also be concerned with the important issues of regional integration and will provide direct technical support to the regional labour administration centre, ARLAC. Advisory services will be made available to the Southern African Labour Commission (SALC), the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC) and the Preferential Trade Area of Eastern and Southern African States (PTA), in accordance with the ILO's mandate.

Zimbabwe is now undertaking a structural adjustment programme whose major objective is to enhance a sustainable rate of economic growth. In this context, the MDTs will play a significant contributory role.

To achieve this objective, the economic reform programme requires that we restructure our economy at all levels to achieve a relatively high level of productivity, at both the production and national levels. Therefore, it is our conviction that economic growth and productivity are the two sides of one equation. The economic reform programme requires the adjustment of production costs, labour and managerial skills. It is also necessary to ensure that workers, youth and vulnerable groups are protected against any negative consequences associated with structural adjustment.

Consequently, my Government instituted a Social Dimensions of Adjustment Programme (SDA) to protect the poor and vulnerable groups, especially the unemployed and retrenched, youth and women and children from the adverse effects of the adjustment programme which are expected in the short and medium term. A Social Development Fund (SDF) has been established to carry out the objective of the SDA programme.

With carefully planned and managed policies to mitigate the negative impact of the structural adjustment programme, we should in the long run be able to generate employment and also improve the living standards of our people.

My Government acknowledges the crucial role played by small-scale enterprises and the informal sector in employment creation.

This sector deserves an enabling environment that renders support in terms of finance, extension services, skills training and infrastructure. The efforts of non-governmental organizations and other developmental agencies are duly recognized and it is hoped that the ILO will give further focus towards the mobilization of resources and close cooperation with all these organizations.

The 80th Session of the International Labour Conference has brought into sharp focus the ideals mankind should strive for in terms of the prevention of major industrial accidents and diseases and concerning part-time work and technical cooperation. All one needs to note is that the ILO should continue in its noble endeavour to improve living conditions and labour standards.

Let me make some brief remarks about the more technical items on the agenda of the Conference. My delegation fully supports the principles behind the proposed instrument on the prevention of major industrial accidents. This is indeed an encouraging move. Industrial accidents worldwide are claiming many lives and causing serious environmental degradation. My delegation hopes that the proposed instrument will give us further guidance in promoting occupational safety and health and environmental protection.

I note that the Conference will address for the first time the aspect of part-time work. Part-time work has developed rapidly over the years. Part-time work may be an attractive and practical arrangement for both enterprises and workers but may pose problems regarding conditions of employment and work. A legal framework for part-time work is important and could be realized by the adoption of relevant international instruments.

My Government fully appreciates the new modalities concerning technical cooperation. It is pleasing to note that now governments are to assume greater responsibilities for the formulation of programmes and execution of projects. This new approach introduces measures that rationalize the use of United Nations assistance and at the same time adapt it more suitably to coordination at the country level. We appreciate the role played in providing training for small-scale enterprises by Improve Your Business (IYB) ILO projects. During the second quarter of 1992, 89 Zimbabwean entrepreneurs and 245 trainers benefited from the IYB training programme.

As our region has been prone to armed conflict, we have quite a sizeable number of disabled persons. The assistance provided by the ILO in the rehabilitation of disabled women under its project for disabled women in Harare is most appreciated.

We are also grateful for the support given to my country by the ILO through the refugee pilot project. As you are aware, Zimbabwe hosts thousands of refugees from neighbouring countries, and hence it would be helpful to start a refugee IYB programme on a larger scale to cater to their needs.

In Zimbabwe the responsibility for enlightening the workers on matters pertaining to occupational health and safety, prevention of industrial accidents, as well as the enforcement of the relevant legislation, has been assigned to the National Social Security Authority (NSSA).

Day-to-day activities for the prevention of occupational injury and diseases are undertaken by the following sections of the Accident Prevention and Workers' Compensation Scheme: the safety and health promotion service; the factory inspectorate; the medical services unit; and the workers' compensation unit.

On the question of drugs and alcohol abuse, we believe that governments and labour ministries should take cognizance of this problem and note that the abuse of drugs is having negative effects on both economic development and the physical and mental well-being of workers.

In conclusion, I would like to extend my best wishes to the ILO as it prepares for the 75th anniversary of its creation and also for the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, due in 1994. We for our part will try to organize events in our country to commemorate these historic events.

Mr. DOBRIN (Employers' delegate, Romania) – I should like to congratulate the President on behalf of the Romanian employers. Our participation in the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference is a great challenge. We will take part in the Conference with the objective of gaining a full understanding of the fundamental principles and values of the ILO. We are confident that employers' organizations should be much more committed to employment growth within a free market economy based on a private initiative.

We recognize that by acting in accordance with the standards of the International Labour Organization and its resolutions, we can obtain excellent technical cooperation which will help us take the appropriate measures to prevent major industrial accidents and minimize their effects. Employers' organizations should consequently concentrate on the educational process, particularly in rapidly changing societies. As is the case of Romania, people have to go on learning throughout their lives. Employers' organizations should conceive and promote approaches to strategic manpower planning and should design policies for ongoing training which facilitate the provision of social insurance and social protection.

We truly hope that during this 80th Session the Romanian employers will become thoroughly conversant with employers' activities and tripartite policies so that next year, when we will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, we can make a greater contribution to the development of international organizations. I wish the fullest success to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The next speaker on my list is Mr. Rhee, Minister of Labour of the Republic of Korea. Allow me on your behalf to congratulate the Republic of Korea for attending this meeting as a full Member of the ILO. I would also like to congratulate the Minister of Labour for having the opportunity to deliver his full speech before this meeting.

Original Korean: Mr. RHEE (Minister of Labour, Republic of Korea) – On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Korea, I would like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election.

I am convinced that under their leadership, and with the active participation of the delegates, this session will be very successful.

I also wish to extend my deep appreciation to the ILO secretariat for its untiring efforts to establish a just society by promoting the welfare of all mankind. This ambitious goal can be reached with the concerted effort of the member States.

In recent decades the world has witnessed the expansion of individual liberty, pluralism and democratization, coupled with industrialization, economic growth and technological innovation. These developments have made each and every government more mindful of the importance of enhancing the welfare of each individual.

In his report Social insurance and social protection, the Director-General of the ILO emphasizes that social security mechanisms for protecting our basic human rights and welfare cannot be implemented solely through the efforts of individual countries. He maintains that implementation will require the efforts and cooperation of the ILO and other international organizations as well as governments, non-governmental groups and the people of the world. I commend him for these meaningful and timely observations.

As a result of political, economic and social development, a firm foundation for social security systems was established in the advanced countries a few decades ago. However, we must admit that, owing to poverty, authoritarian political systems and ineffective executive mechanisms, the developing countries have yet to establish stable social security systems.

The report also emphasizes the critical importance of expanding coverage, increasing benefits, maintaining present systems and achieving appropriate policy cohesion, thus extending social security benefits to as many people as possible in developing countries.

The most important element in establishing a suitable system of social security is the will of individuals and governments, accompanied by sound national economic foundations. While the realization of such efforts can be left to individual countries, the international community, including the ILO, must continue to render assistance to developing countries so that they may expand their economic bases and better provide for the social security of their citizens.

With sustained economic growth since the 1960s, the Republic of Korea has steadily increased the financing of its social security system. Consequently, the living standard of Koreans has risen. Improvements can be observed in such areas as health care, housing, education, and in the well-being of its workers.

My Government has laid the foundation for a social security system by introducing nationwide medical insurance, a national pension system, and workmen's accident compensation insurance.

In the mid-1990s, a pension system for farmers and fishermen and an unemployment insurance system will be added to my country's social security programmes. Through such programmes, the Korean Government is making efforts to build a welfare system in which all people can enjoy their share of economic prosperity.

Today, the Republic of Korea is now entering a new era which requires the construction of a model for continued development that emphasizes autonomy, participation, and creativity in all sectors of the economy, while boosting democratization, openness and internationalization of the Korean economy.

Under a civilian Government that was inaugurated in February 1993, we are hard at work creating a new Korea with wide public support. We are implementing reforms in pursuit of a more mature, just and prosperous democracy.

In particular, industrial relations in Korea are rapidly moving in a more democratic direction, and the tripartite agreement among workers, employers and the Government is being widely respected.

In keeping with the changing tide, the Ministry of Labour is making every effort to help revitalize the Korean economy and to improve the quality of working life through the reform of labour policies. This will contribute to the improvement of Korea's welfare programmes, and result in the harmonization of autonomy and responsibility.

I would like to take this opportunity to offer a few comments on the agenda of this session of the Conference, beginning with the prevention of major industrial accidents, which is the topic for second discussion. In my view, it is a most timely and meaningful subject in light of the fact that today the growing production and use of hazardous and noxious materials has increased the possibility of major industrial accidents such as fires, explosions and gas leaks which exacerbate the risk of extensive environmental damage.

The Republic of Korea is seeking to exercise utmost care in order to prevent major industrial accidents. We are pursuing an array of preventive measures, such as the enactment and reform of various regulations related to industrial safety and health, a nationwide campaign to make people more safety conscious at work, and interministerial joint action targeted at major hazardous industrial facilities.

In this regard, I would like to stress the importance of technology exchange, information sharing, and mutual cooperation among the agencies of the United Nations such as the ILO, UNEP and the WHO, as well as among developed and developing countries. I urge all member countries to continue investing, within their capabilities, in measures to prevent major industrial accidents.

The second topic I would like to comment on is part-time work, the topic for first discussion. In my view, this is also a timely and desirable subject considering the current trend toward declining workhours, flexible work schedules, and diversified employment patterns, as well as the growing adoption of new production systems which require labour flexibility.

Although at present the proportion of part-time workers in Korea's total workforce is very low compared to that of the advanced countries, it is expected to increase in the near future. Accordingly, it is becoming important for the Korean Government to deal with issues relating to part-time work.

To protect part-time workers, in 1991 my Government drafted and implemented Guidelines to Guarantee Working Conditions for Part-Time Workers, laying the basis for a system that will be continuously improved by the Government.

I would like to stress, however, that the provisions of any new international labour standards on part time work should be sufficiently flexible to enable member countries to apply them according to their own conditions and circumstances.

Today, the international community is faced with ethnic confrontations, racial discrimination, religious strife and poverty. I believe that, to resolve such conflicts and challenges, we must begin at the most fundamental level, with basic respect for each other's inalienable rights. We must recognize that all people are equal and we must assist others in their time to need. Such actions serve to reaffirm our unending faith in the ILO's basic principle of human dignity.

The Republic of Korea will do its best to fulfil its mission and duties as a member State by actively participating in the ILO's diverse activities.

I sincerely hope that this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference will prove to be most fruitful in promoting peace, prosperity and justice for all mankind.

Mr. SANGMA (Minister of State for Labour, India) – May I extend to the President and the Vice-Presidents warm felicitations on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf on their election. I also congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his unanimous election as Director-General of the ILO for another term. Mr. Hansenne's stewardship has provided a purposeful direction to the activities of this great Organization and by electing him for another term we will immensely benefit further from his guidance. I also welcome the new Member States who have recently joined the ILO fraternity.

I have read with considerable interest the Report of the Director-General on ILO activities for the year 1992. The efforts of the Organization in the areas of wider observance of international labour standards, promoting employment and training, working conditions and environment, and social security and technical cooperation, are quite impressive.

For some time now, the ILO has been having stagnant levels of budgets. We do appreciate the financial stringency faced by the ILO. The matter of concern, however, is that staff costs account for about 70 per cent of the budget. I know that the ILO does have plans for deferring appointments against identified staff positions. But belt-tightening and declaring redundancies have serious limits. Positive solutions have to be sought – like mobilizing more resources including extra-budgetary support of a significantly high order. I do hope that innovations, like the formation of multi-disciplinary teams, national execution of projects and transfer of resources on a decentralized basis, will lead to increased productivity, efficiency and economy in the ILO.

India has ratified 36 ILO Conventions and has also enacted laws to implement them. Apart from submitting detailed statements to our Parliament, we have also recently conducted a comprehensive review of the status of ratifications. We have always given the highest consideration to the instruments adopted by the Conference. These Conventions, whether ratified or not, provide guidelines in the formulation of our social and labour policies and programmes.

An important item listed for deliberation is the adoption of international labour standards for the part-time workers. In developing societies, where unemployment and underemployment are of a high order, stringent labour protection could turn out to be counter-productive. A delicate balance will have to be struck between labour protection for part-time workers and the economic viability of employers engaging part-time labour. In other words, the standards for part-time work should be so designed as to make it an instrument of employment generation. In any case, for the present, we could rest content with making a recommendation on the subject.

Child labour is a universal phenomenon the world over, in both developed and developing countries. Every country is taking steps to combat it, taking into consideration its socio-economic conditions. We have to recognize that, in many countries, this is a deep-rooted problem which can be eradicated only over a period of time. International institutions and specialized organizations must seek to persuade rather than coerce countries into taking the steps needed to solve the problem. The Government of India is fully seized with the problem of child labour and is determined to take all necessary steps to eradicate it as soon as possible.

Apart from legislation to tackle the problem, India, by formulating a national policy on child labour, has adopted a multi-disciplinary approach. The aim is to set out positive programmes for the health, education and nutrition of children and all-round integrated action on the part of international agencies, the Government and the Non-Governmental Organizations. Parents should be educated on the need for children to be sent to school instead of work. Employers, too, should come forward to help wean children away from the world of work. Wages should be statutorily regulated so that for the employers, employment of children will not be an economically attractive proposition. However, in the process of removing children from employment, we should not also lose sight of the need to continue to impart vocational skills to them. Mere general education could be irrelevant to employment in adult life. In this context, we appreciate the initiative taken by the Director-General on IPEC as well as the support of Germany and Belgium.

Migration of labour populations is a phenomenon caused not merely by poverty but also by a lack of balance in regional development. Workers tend to migrate from low-wage areas to the high-wage areas. Migrations are also caused by demand for specific skills in certain areas. This pressure of different causal factors creates complex situations. The ILO programmes on migrant workers need to be intensified – for taking stock, to study trends, to investigate levels of labour protection and to propose remedies.

In April 1993 the ILO successfully conducted the 13th World Congress on Occupational Safety and Health in collaboration with the International Social Security Association and the National Safety Council of India. More than 50 countries participated and I am sure that the deliberations of this Congress would form a meaningful backdrop for the discussions to be held on the proposed adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on prevention of industrial disasters.

The Director-General's Report on Social insurance and social protection has been well timed. The Report is indeed thought-provoking. The suggestion to build social security policy into the overall framework of the general development strategy, side by side with tailoring solutions to the national context, is quite down-to-earth and realistic.

My country is passing through a critical phase of comprehensive economic reforms. The restrictions on investments have been dismantled, the import-export regime liberalized and monetary reforms introduced. In this process of structural adjustments, the workers fear redundancies and retrenchments. Our Prime Minister is immensely aware of the need for reforms being carried out with a human face. We have created the National Renewal Fund with domestic and external funding. The resources from this fund are being used for training, retraining, redeployment, generous separation benefits and employment generation. We have also created under the Labour Minister special tripartite bodies for six major industries. These bodies have recommended meaningful measures to secure a fair deal for labour in the process of adjustments. I would urge that the ILO should lay special emphasis on evolving programmes for skill development and employment promotion and should work interactively with the other United Nations agencies and the World Bank.

On the question of increased emphasis being placed on tripartism, all I can say is that tripartism in India has come to stay and is probably second to none. I myself head nearly 50 tripartite committees at the central government level and we have ensured that tripartism is indeed the vehicle of the future.

I also thank the Director-General for the Report on Apartheid in South Africa. As you are all aware, India was the first country to inscribe the issue of Apartheid on the agenda of the United Nations and was influential in the imposition of sanctions against South Africa. The recent developments have given rise to the expectation of an early formation of fully representative interim government in South Africa. The entire international community must extend its helping hand for an early realization of a non-racial and democratic South Africa.

I take this opportunity to call upon all my colleagues who came to Teheran this April to treat the recommendations of the 13th Conference of Asian and Pacific Labour Ministers as a blueprint for future coordinated follow-up action on all the significant issues raised in the Conference.

We have been able to secure for the ILO and ARTEP office accommodation in one of the most prestigious localities in New Delhi. With such an infrastructure, a new multi-disciplinary team and a vast network of labour and management institutions spread in different parts of the country, I am sure the ILO will use India as a vital base for its operations in the region.

I conclude by wishing every success for this 80th Session of the Conference.

Original Lao: Mr. INTHATHIRATH (Workers' delegate, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the Lao Federation of Trade Unions it is a great honour and privilege for me to participate in the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to express my heartfelt thanks to the Governing Body of the ILO for the warm welcome and all the facilities which they have provided to our delegation, enabling us to attend this important Conference on behalf of the workers and labouring people all over the world.

As you all know, the Lao People's Democratic Republic is a small and backward landlocked country which has recently emerged from colonization and is now reconstructing its national, social and economic sectors and culture on the basis of an independent democracy with the help of foreign cooperation.

Our trade union organization actively participates in the defence and protection of the legitimate rights and interests of the workers. The Lao trade union organization stimulates and encourages the workers of all ethnic groups, helping them to develop their skills and exploit their talent and potential in order to foster the growth of the economy and culture and promote social insurance.

Our Government has changed the bureaucratic and mainly subventionalist mechanism of economic management and is now using a market economy to develop all economic sectors and to introduce a form of State capitalism to boost the production of goods, the free and legal circulation of goods, improve the performance and reform of the State collective economic system, promote and stimulate family-based economy and privatization, and to open up economic relations and cooperation with foreign countries.

The economic situation is improving, inflation is no longer critical, prices of goods are no longer rapidly increasing and the living conditions of our people have improved.

We have reformed the collective system. Peasant families are now the main unit of production and the managers of collective farms and Government technical staff provide technical knowledge and assistance with fertilizers, pests, insecticides, vaccines, etc. Farmers are working hard on their land, production has improved and there are now two harvests a year.

To implement the Government's policies on environmental protection, our trade union is encouraging the people to cultivate the forests and plant fruit trees and avoid slash and burn cultivation and shifting agriculture.

At present every country in our region is earnestly discussing the struggle against nuclear war and the maintenance of peace, security, health care and the environment. We have also started to carry out joint studies on employment problems and on ways and means of enhancing the living conditions of the working people. We realize, however, that the policies of some countries are geared to using scientific and technical achievements to produce and stock nuclear weapons for destructive purposes instead of using modern science and technology to promote the prosperity of mankind.

I should like briefly to describe to you how the trade unions function in our country. The main functions of the Lao trade unions are: to protect the legitimate rights and interest of the workers; to educate and train the workers; to strengthen solidarity, promote democracy and mobilize the workers in support of State policies and equal rights; to provide employment opportunities; to settle labour disputes peacefully through the Labour Relations Commission, which is made up of trade union members.

A Labour Act was enacted on 29 November 1990 to regulate employment relationships and make full use of workers' abilities to promote further social and economic development. This Act covers all undertakings and organizations in both the public and private sectors. Our labour standards and laws fix maximum hours of work for all industrial and commercial establishments. The working week is six days long, with no more than eight hours per day; a maximum of 36 hours per week is prescribed for work which may be considered detrimental to human health. The Act prohibits the employment of pregnant women and children under 15 years of age in hazardous and arduous work. Women and children under 15 years of age may be employed only in light work and must work no more than six hours per day. The Act also fixes minimum working conditions and lays down safety rules and regulations reflecting occupational safety and health.

Employers must provide workers with appropriate lighting, clean drinking water, protective equipment and health care; they must also provide free medical care and pay at least 50 per cent of workers' medical bills. The Act also makes provision for the establishment of a pension scheme and a bonus scheme. Employers are required to set up a social insurance fund to which workers must contribute.

For the construction and defence of our country, our State has promulgated many social policies and regulations for the health care of workers and their families, and one of these is the provision of regulations on social security. These regulations consist of provisions of fundamental social interest for the workers, namely the right to paid leave in the event of illness, occupational accidents and diseases and the right to paid maternity leave.

The social security policies of our country are improving constantly. When on sick leave workers are entitled to social security allowances equivalent to 75 to 95 per cent of the wage depending on their years of service. Those who have been working for over 30 successive years, or those who are given the title of heroes or heroines, are entitled to a sickness allowance equivalent to 100 per cent of their salary. If a worker has to take leave because of an occupational accident or disease, allowances equal to the full wage are paid irrespective of years of service. Women workers are also entitled to full maternity pay. In this process of improving social security policies, the Lao trade unions have made an active contribution to extending the coverage for workers carrying out arduous or hazardous work in mountainous and remote regions. We attach great importance to maternity and child protection and feel it is very important to provide favourable conditions for nursing mothers. The number of days of maternity leave depends on the workplace and on the number of children.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Now I give the floor to Mr. Sattar Mehbaliyev, the Workers' delegate of the Republic of Azerbaijan. I would like to congratulate the Republic of Azerbaijan on its admission to the ILO, and I would like to congratulate Mr. Mehbaliyev for having the opportunity to address this Conference for the first time.

Original Azeri: Mr. SATTAR MEHBALIYEV (Workers' delegate, Azerbaijan) – In this forum the difficult search is conducted for solutions to the problems of worker security and the defence of workers' interests. These problems are analysed in detail in the interesting reports of the Governing Body and also in the Director-General's Report and in the statements made by the various participants. The Republic of Azerbaijan recently achieved independence and it is experiencing the same problems. As the international community knows, following the breakup of the USSR Azerbaijan and the other former Soviet Republics threw off the chains of totalitarianism and for the second time in their history found liberty and sovereignty. Our country has begun to construct a democratic State worthy of the name, and I should like to tell you about some of the problems which we are encountering as well as the prospects for development which we foresee in this difficult situation.

For many years our Republic provided the capital with fuel and raw materials. The agricultural sector and industrial enterprises worked with obsolete equipment. This led to many almost insurmountable social problems and to an environmental crisis.

Our income and food consumption are far less than average. Housing, medical and environmental problems are amongst the most difficult problems which our Republic has to resolve. Our young Republic has found it particularly difficult to find employment for some 300,000 unemployed people, not to mention for thousands of refugees, although we have the sufficient economic and intellectual potential to overcome these problems in the long run. However, the fact that Armenia is encroaching upon our territory and violating the integrity of our Republic, and has been doing so for two years, is having repercussions on our country's development: 12 per cent of the Republic's territory has been occupied by the aggressors from Armenia.

Thousands of peace-loving people have been killed. Tens of thousands of otherwise able-bodied people have become handicapped in the occupied areas. Hundreds of occupied villages, towns and inhabited areas have been razed to the ground and burnt. Our people's property is pillaged and this plunder is continuing to the present day.

Unfortunately the conflict is spreading and our peace-loving people are being expelled from their homes. They are being exterminated and they are being taken hostage. Last year at the beginning of the previous session of the International Labour Conference towns such as Shusha and Lachin were being occupied; the people of Azerbaijan had undergone a genocide in Khodjali. This year the Armenian aggressors have occupied the whole Kelbadjar region, which is far from Nagorny Karabakh. Our numerous attempts to find a peaceful settlement through the CSCE have led to nothing, and even today, while the United Nations Security Council is discussing the conflict Armenia is defying Resolution 822 and the peace initiative of the United States, Turkey and Russia.

In the face of this blatant aggression, our Republic is making every effort to regain its territory by peaceful means.

We have taken in a hundred thousand refugees. This influx is one of the most difficult problems we face. The inhabitants of Azerbaijan who were expelled first from Armenia and then from Nagorny Karabakh found themselves sacrificed to political considerations. Since we have to provide these people with housing, clothing, supplies, medicines and employment, you can imagine the difficult economic situation in which we find ourselves. Obviously, we understand that the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan is not the only conflict in today's world. This is why we believe it is important that we should be able to adopt new international legal standards to find a solution to this problem, and which would enable us to determine the status of these refugees in the spirit of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

We hope that all international organizations will be unanimous on this subject. At the same time, our people believe that justice will triumph, and we have confidence in the authority and humanitarian spirit of the world community. We believe in you, because we hope that you can harness the aggressor and restore justice and peace. One of the main aims of our State is to create an economy and a State which could subordinate production to the interests of consumers. At the same time, we have to overcome the shortage of goods and services, re-establish many forms of ownership, in particular through privatization, and make it possible for our citizens to achieve economic independence. How are we to solve these problems? It is going to be difficult in this period of transition. Following the disintegration of the Soviet empire, the Trade Union Centre of Azerbaijan was able to select the path toward democratic and independent development. Last February, on the basis of democratic principles, the new Trade Union Centre of Azerbaijan was established. This is the largest collaboration including 33 private trade unions. Obviously, given the transformation of economic relationships, trade union relations are now experiencing difficulties, mainly because private ownership is only just coming into being. In order to improve difficult working conditions, to improve salaries, to find solutions to the many social problems, to defend rights and resolve conflicts between the entrepreneurs and the State, we have to adopt new laws in the spirit of international legal standards. We must be able to regulate social and economic relationships. Due to all the numerous difficulties of the transition period, we feel a sense of frustration but we are very happy to say that today, the forces of democracy have given our trade unions enough leeway so that they use their own initiative and adopt practical measures. We have promulgated a number of acts, including the act on employment, on the privatization of state property, on indexing income, on the property of citizens of Azerbaijan, on pensions, on employment conditions, etc. We are sure that we will soon be able to adopt legislation concerning trade unions after it has been examined by Parliament. The Parliament is currently examining a bill on social cooperation and labour contracts. The main provisions of the legislation we have recently adopted and which cover the economic and social sectors as well as the labour sector, comply with the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organization. At this time there is one important question – the ratification of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention 1981 (No. 155). We would like to defend workers' rights and workers' interests and we would like to deepen our relationship with the ILO.

We are sure that with your cooperation we will be able to make progress, and we hope that international pressure will be brought to bear upon the Armenian aggressors.

Original German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) – May I heartily first of all congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I trust that under his experienced guidance the proceedings of this session will be brought to a successful conclusion.

The world has changed since the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, and our Organization must take these events into account.

As an employers' representative, I attended a conference of the democratic trade unions of Eastern Europe at which a clear wish was expressed for the establishment not only of strong workers' organizations but also of free employers' federations so that both groups move successfully, on a democractic basis, towards a social market economy.

For the ILO this implies providing both sides of industry with the assistance they need to set up such organizations rapidly and efficiently.

A further important task, particularly in the difficult economic circumstances prevailing throughout the world, is to take into account the suggestions made by the Committee on Employment of the Governing Body. I believe that these programmes are of crucial importance.

As far as Conventions are concerned, what matters is not the number of Conventions adopted but rather the number of ratifications.

I am firmly convinced that it is more important for successful economic and social development to review old and outdated Conventions than to conclude new ones that are often ratified by only a small number of States. As many Conventions lack the necessary flexibility, they often cannot be ratified even by States that are socially advanced.

Our common task is more important today than ever before, and it is crucial that we set about solving the most pressing problems rather than allowing ourselves to be sidetracked by matters of secondary importance.

But this can only be done if we pursue an appropriate manpower policy that assigns the right tasks to the right people. I firmly believe that this is a problem which demands our very special attention.

It also implies fostering the necessary skills in the younger generation so that no major gaps arise when people reach retirement age. The high standard of existing manpower must not only be maintained but reinforced. I am sure that under the leadership of our Director-General, whom I warmly congratulate on behalf of the Austrian Employers on his re-election we shall be able to fulfil the broad range of tasks confronting us for the benefit both of the developing countries and of the threshold and industrialized countries.

As the only tripartite organization within the United Nations family, we have a duty to solve the very difficult problems of the present time through a concentrated effort on the part of all three groups. In 1969 the ILO was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

Let me close with a vision of the future in which the workers, employers and governments of all the current 162 member States of this Organization help to secure and maintain peace throughout the world for all time.

May social peace, to which we are committed, pave the way for peaceful development in all five continents.

Original French: Mrs. SASSO-MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – I should like to congratulate the President most warmly and sincerely on his election and I undertake to contribute to the best of my ability to the success of this session of the Conference.

The subject of social security discussed in the Director-General's Report this year is extremely topical and offers a modern vision of one of the most acutely felt problems of our age.

It is true, as stressed in the Report, that social security is one of the acquired rights of the workers in industrialized countries, whereas, to this very day, the populations of the developing countries are very far from being so well protected. In the latter, where pensions or regular unemployment benefits are concerned, the role of institutionalized social security still remains rather limited.

However, this should not serve as a pretext for reducing protection where it already exists. On the contrary, we must improve protection wherever this is possible. It would be desirable, where this is feasible, to let the individual be partially responsible for his or her level of protection rather than leaving all the responsibility to the State. To this end, savings and private funds should be used. This is the concept of shared responsibility referred to on page 79, first paragraph, of the French text of the Report. And I fully endorse this concept.

The growing share of social security in the budgets of industrialized countries is an incentive to finding a new approach to this controversial issue.

Our country, like other countries in Europe, has a state deficit which is no longer sustainable and has therefore been obliged to adopt reforms – deferred for decades – which call for great sacrifices in pensions and in health care. This is an effort which each individual will have to make throughout his or her working life in order to retain at the time of retirement a living standard comparable to that of active life.

The employers, although they are aware of the difficulties inherent in this new approach, have for many years now been making proposals along these lines.

Unemployment protection has, on the contrary, been reinforced because of the economic crisis and the difficulties encountered by enterprises.

In my opinion, the ILO should play a leading part in bringing about a convergence in the levels of protection in the various regions of the world.

The ILO will have further to intensify its work, although a great deal is being done already, to achieve ratification and effective application in all countries of ILO instruments concerning social security and to endeavour to extend the range of protected categories beyond the privileged few which exist so far.

Tripartite action in this area has definite advantages, especially if the social partners work together to make headway.

Coming to the second part of the Report, I should like to take note of the very satisfactory results achieved by the ILO. The Director-General deserves our appreciation and our support.

We should like to convey special congratulations together with a word of encouragement to carry on the good work to the Director of the Turin Centre, Mr. Trémeaud. We commend his efficient management and his ability to develop the quality of this valuable tool of the ILO, a tool which has demonstrated excellent performance.

I should like at this point to make a few comments on the future of our Organization and on how it can meet the new needs of our age.

Whilst the priority today is still the struggle against poverty and the development of productive employment, the ILO should seek out new areas to generate employment beyond the major traditional sectors to which the activities of our Organization have so far been principally devoted. These sectors are currently engaged in a long and complicated process of restructuring to adjust to the crisis, and experts agree in predicting that in the short term they will not be able to generate new employment.

For the developing countries, the sectors which need a boost are basically the rural sector and the informal urban sector. In these sectors technical cooperation studies and ILO advisory services should be brought into play in order to foster, without rigidity, a climate favourable to the generating of productive and freely chosen employment.

Flexibility should be a major consideration in all standard-setting activities of our Organization. The agenda of our Conference should be limited. The instruments adopted should be accessible to all so that they may be ratified and applied by the vast majority of countries.

In my opinion, the most recent standards are tending in the opposite direction. They are applicable only in a very limited number of industrialized countries. Moreover, when new instruments are produced, outdated standards should be revised at the same time. The updating of the international labour code should have the same priority as the adoption of new standards.

The Employers' group has tabled a well-argued document on priorities, goals and the ways in which we can adapt our Organization and its instruments to the constantly changing needs of the peoples who form it.

Italian employers share the concerns expressed in this document and support the means proposed for effecting a thorough-going change in the criteria and methods used so far.

We continue to be ready to make our contribution to the renewal of the ILO, a renewal called for by economic, social and political developments of recent years.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to His Excellency, the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mr. Juras of Croatia, and I would like to congratulate him for the admission of his country to the ILO and I would like to congratulate him for having the floor for the first time in addressing this Conference.

Mr. JURAS (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Croatia) – I am honoured and pleased to greet, in the name of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, all the participants of the Conference, and to express great satisfaction at the fact that the Republic of Croatia, as a new Member of the International Labour Organization, is now a full participant in this Conference.

Let me familiarize you with some of the major facts regarding the Republic of Croatia. After 1990, the year when the first democratic free elections were held, and after the will of the Croatian people longing for freedom was confirmed by the referendum, the struggle for independence began. On 25 June 1991, the day when the Croatian Parliament adopted the declaration of independence, the war of aggression against Croatia commenced; at the beginning, in a disguised, but later, in a very direct and brutal manner. The former Yugoslavia and its criminal army started to use modern weapons for open attack against Croatian towns and villages and the consequences were only ruins, dead, wounded and expelled persons. In fact, the loss of privileges based on the Great Serbian hegemony, which had been secured by the totalitarian communist regime lies behind this criminal war.

A result of the war against Croatia, but also a result of the communist system in the former Yugoslavia is perhaps most clearly seen by the social structure of the Republic of Croatia which is characterized by the following data:

- 4,874,263 inhabitants of the Republic of Croatia (according to the population census in 1991);
- 846,483 persons employed in the productive branches of the economy – socially owned sector;
- 235,111 persons employed in the public services (non-productive branches of the economy) – socially owned sector;
- 117,914 persons employed in the private sector;
- 1,199,508 employed persons in total (excluding those engaged in the Ministry of the Interior/police/and in the Croatian Army);
- 251,041 displaced persons in the Republic of Croatia;
- 782,306 retired persons (pensioners);
- 255,101 unemployed persons;
- 29,047 persons receiving unemployment benefit (pecuniary compensation);
- 33,000 employees who receive minimal wages/salaries, that are paid out on the strength of the "Decree on providing resources/funds, on materializing rights and mode of paying-out minimal wages/salaries and allowances to specific natural and juridical persons owing to the consequences caused by the war against the Republic of Croatia";
- 180,000 recipients of various material types of social welfare support;
- 50,000 persons receiving subsidies;
- 208,414 receivers of children's allowance;
- 7,784 persons killed in the homeland war;
- 13,788 persons missing during the homeland war;
- 21,000 persons disabled in the homeland war; and
- 3,724 children with one parent killed in the homeland war.

It is estimated that the following persons are potentially socially imperilled in the existential sense:

- about two-thirds of registered unemployed persons;
- about 270,000 retired persons;
- about 140,000 persons receiving aid and allowances under the social welfare scheme;
- a major part of persons receiving child benefit and subsidies for rent or for subtenant's rent; and
- a certain number of the employed persons, farmers and other persons whose incomes do not cover minimal living costs.

The seriousness of the situation is reinforced by the fact that war was waged against the neighbouring State of Bosnia and Herzegovina. As a result of this war the Republic of Croatia has had to provide shelter for 298,246 refugees, while about 600,000 refugees have passed through Croatia on their way to find shelter in third countries.

At first sight, the data just presented are discouraging, but I want to assure you that both the Croatian Government and Parliament as well as the Croatian people do not lack the courage or the will power to face these problems.

Please let me outline briefly the programme of my Government which aims to stabilize conditions in the Republic of Croatia, and the development guidelines for economic and social welfare policies.

The main emphasis of the efforts of the Government of the Republic of Croatia is on the attempt to establish a durable and righteous peace not only in Croatia but also throughout the territory of the former Yugoslavia. We are convinced that the efforts made by the Croatian Government and Croatian policy as a whole present a factor of stability in this region. So I am making a strong appeal to the delegates of this Conference, if the circumstances permit, to communicate faithfully to their respective governments the desire of the Government of Croatia to establish peace. The Government of the Republic of Croatia will do its very best to ensure the highest possible levels of human rights and of freedoms in the Republic of Croatia, particularly with regard to the rights of minorities.

The tasks I am responsible for in the Croatian Government fall within the competence of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, and include the implementation of labour, employment and social security policies. I want to convey to you the political determination of my Government that the Republic of Croatia be an active member of the International Labour Organization, easily recognizable by its commitment to accept the principles and standards of this Organization.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia has made a decision by which it makes a firm commitment to respect the 25 International Labour Organization Conventions to which the former Yugoslavia was a party, and the procedure for giving notification of the succession of the Republic of Croatia in regard to all the Conventions to which the former Yugoslavia was a party is under way. I am sure that the International Labour Organization will soon be informed by the Croatian Government that the Republic of Croatia feels obliged to act in compliance with all the Conventions to which the former Yugoslavia was a party, specifically referring to all the Conventions that were legally valid on its territory on 8 October 1991.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia will continue the process of ratification of other Conventions of the International Labour Organization which it considers to be reflections of civilized developmental achievements in the fields of labour, employment and social security.

I trust that in this way the willingness of the Republic of Croatia to be cooperative and to be an open country regarding the international supervision of the application of accepted standards will become manifest. The entire legal system in the Republic of Croatia is now being modified and new legal regulations are being adopted to make the legal system compatible with the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia, the principles of which offer good reason for the Republic of Croatia to be proud.

With the new legal regulations in the fields of labour, employment and social security, the Government of the Republic of Croatia wishes to apply consistently the principle of tripartism which it esteems as a very high-ranking achievement of civilization. We are convinced that a wide use of this principle will reveal the energy of the nation that has been accumulated through centuries and the desire for Croatia to become a free, independent and democratic welfare State with economic and social prosperity for all its citizens.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia hopes that its efforts will not remain unnoticed and will meet with the necessary support of the international community, which I strongly believe will respond in accordance with the United Nations Resolution which recommends to the international community to render comprehensive assistance and aid to Croatia.

In this respect, the Government of the Republic of Croatia will feel free to ask for corresponding aid from the International Labour Organization.

I am grateful for the attention accorded to me and to my country.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.10 p.m.)

Credentials

Brief report by Mr. M. Vargas Campos, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 1 June 1993

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in Articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on 1 June 1993 at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference. In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 121 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. With respect to one other State (Zaire), two communications have been received from different sources, each claiming to be the competent authority to appoint the delegation of that country to the Conference. Pending consideration of this question by the Credentials Committee, once it is set up, no person mentioned in these communications has been recorded as accredited to the Conference or included in the table annexed to this report.

It is to be noted that only 68 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 18 May 1993, that is within the 15 days' deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which Article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, two countries (Congo and Ethiopia) had only nominated Government delegates, one country (Lao People's Democratic Republic) had nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate and one country (Ecuador) had nominated an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organizations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organization, or have not confirmed that they will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers in accordance with paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the Constitution. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing their credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nominations of delegates and advisers, the form enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference, and quorum

At present 230 Government delegates, 118 Employers' delegates and 118 Workers' delegates – a total of 466 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 619 Government advisers, 312 Employers' advisers and 366 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,297 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organization to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,763.

Since one State has nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate and one State has nominated an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate, two delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

Since ten of the States[1] now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organization, those Members, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of a further 35 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organization and with Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 215.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Bermuda, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Oman and the Holy See have appointed observer delegations to the Conference.

Organizations and liberation movements invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph I – relating to reciprocal representation – of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Before dealing with the first item on our agenda which is the first report of the Selection Committee, I should like to thank you for the work which was accomplished yesterday within the framework of the Conference. We hope that the experiments with the electronic voting system have proved useful. I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – You have mentioned the question of electronic voting and I just wanted to explain in a few words what happened yesterday evening.

As you will have seen, the first vote went well. In their enthusiasm everybody wanted to vote and to try out the little machine at the same time – those who had the right to vote and those who did not. We decided that there would be a simulation in a real situation, that is to say that even for the demonstration those without the right to vote would be unable to vote. The idea was to show that it was possible for the system to "filter" the delegates as it were. What we didn't do – for lack of experience, but we shall do this in the future – was to block the voting positions between the two votes, with the result that there was information coming from all sides which caused a blockage as regards moving on to the next vote. That is a minor point but an extremely useful one for our technicians. In the future appropriate measures will be taken to remedy this. Having said that – and I would like to insist on this point – this is an entirely new system which has been tailormade for us in a very short time: we even had to urge the company which produced this system for us to work as rapidly as possible but they said they need an additional month in order to guarantee that the system was truly operational. We wanted to see, in a realistic situation, how it would work out. Now we can make a number of minor corrections. This is inevitable when one introduces a new system but in no way calls into question the validity of the system because it has already been tested methodically in other circumstances and it is clearly a system which works very satisfactorily. So we have no fears. In any event we have the whole month of June to overcome any minor difficulties of this kind. We rely on your understanding. We are convinced that the system – "yes, no, abstention" – is operational.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We thank the Secretariat for these clarifications and now give the floor to the Chairman of the Selection Committee for presentation of the first report of that committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5.

Mr. GOPALAN (Government delegate, India; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first Report of the Selection Committee, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 5. This Report deals first with the election of the Officers of the Committee. As regards the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and Director-General, as you all know this began yesterday afternoon and the Committee had decided that the list of speakers should be closed next Thursday, 10 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions. Then the Committee endorsed a general plan of work for the Conference committees. Although it is not binding, it will enable the committees to organize their work so as to take the maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. This plan of work is appended to this report in appendix 2.

The Selection Committee has set the date for the elections to the Governing Body for Wednesday, 9 June. There will be no other tripartite meetings on that day. As regards electronic voting, appendix 1 to the Committee's report contains a written description of the new electronic voting system which was demonstrated to you last evening. The Selection Committee invites the Conference to decide on an ad hoc basis that, unless the Officers of the Conference decide otherwise for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the Plenary by means of the electronic voting system. I should like to call the attention of the members of the Conference to the parts of the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, all of which are designed to ensure the smooth working of the Conference. As regards participation in Conference committees by members who have lost the right to vote, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the practice followed in the past few years by Government members should be continued whereby they do not apply for regular membership of committees if they are not, at the time, entitled to vote. The Selection Committee also recommends to the Conference that should this practice for any reason not be fully respected, the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

In another recommendation the Committee proposes that certain non-governmental national organizations should be invited to be represented in some of the Conference committees.

On the basis of proposals made by the Director General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting of the Conference to consider the appendix to his Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. It took this decision on the understanding that at that sitting speakers would confine their remarks to that appendix and that, conversely, the subject would not be discussed in the framework of the debate on the remainder of the Report. The Committee decided that the special sitting should be held in the afternoon of Thursday, 10 June. The Selection Committee recommends to the Conference to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the general report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the report. In view of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor at the special sitting, it is likely that a shorter time limit for speeches will be necessary. The Selection Committee has accordingly decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 12 noon on Tuesday, 8 June, so as to enable the President to submit to the Conference a proposal for a time limit for speeches at the special sitting. The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intended to devote a part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of his Report to drawing lessons from the special sitting.

The Selection Committee has also decided that the following committees should not meet at the same time as the special sitting: the Finance Committee, the Resolutions Committee and the Committee on Apartheid.

The Selection Committee also refers to the Conference a proposal by the Governing Body in the form of a draft resolution concerning the minimum timetable for the Eighth African Regional Conference.

The officers of the Committee have made proposals regarding the appointment of the Credentials Committee and have also made recommendations to the Conference concerning the composition of the Drafting Committee of the Conference. The officers of the Committee also recommend that the Conference invite an intergovernmental organization, namely the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment, to be represented at the 80th Session of the Conference.

Finally, the officers of the Committee recommend that the Conference approve a number of changes in the composition of committees. These are listed in appendix 3. The full list of the composition of committees is given in appendix 4, which takes account of these changes.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Thank you Chairman of the Selection Committee and the members of that Committee. Are there any comments or objections which anyone wishes to make? If not I shall consider that the report is adopted.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item of the agenda, that is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. MASINDE (Minister for Labour, Kenya) – On behalf of the Kenya delegation, please allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate the President and the other officers of the Conference on their well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

My delegation has noted that the Report of the Director-General to the Conference consists of two parts. In Part I the Director-General has covered in great detail the central theme for this year's session of the Conference, that is the development of systems of social security and social protection in the member States, highlighting the future development of these systems, the problems facing health care programmes, and the question of social protection against various social contingencies in the light of the adverse economic circumstances in recent years. Part II contains an account of ILO activities in 1992 as well as information concerning the programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium.

Speaking generally, the Kenya delegation notes with satisfaction that the question of social security has always been foremost among the concerns of the International Labour Organization, as evidenced by the adoption of the various standards aimed at the protection of certain categories of workers against specific contingencies such as maternity, industrial accidents, occupational diseases, sickness, invalidity, death of the breadwinner and unemployment. Such standards include the Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 35), and the Old-Age Insurance (Agriculture) Convention, 1933 (No. 36). Further standard-setting work by the International Labour Organization in this field focused on a broader global concept of social security measures to provide basic income to all in need of such protection, as well as comprehensive medical care.

It is my delegation's view that the adoption of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), marked a turning point in the history of social security, in the sense that it introduced the concept of the general minimum standards of social security which member States must aim at reaching.

In the case of Kenya, social security as an institutionalised scheme was not mooted until the late the 1950s when the then colonial government sought to introduce some social security protection for African workers, since most of them were not covered by the existing pension schemes. This objective, however, was not realized until the independent Kenya Government declared its socio-economic policy of providing social protection to its working population.

Despite financial and manpower constraints and high population growth, the emergent Government made concrete recommendations to establish a provident fund as a basis upon which a pension scheme would later be developed. Thus, the National Social Security Fund, which is a compulsory savings scheme for workers, was established by an Act of Parliament in 1965. The Fund provides for old age, invalidity and survivors' benefits for persons who are protected under it on a compulsory contribution basis (not including civil servants, university employees and local authorities who have their own pension schemes). Under the National Social Security Fund Act, which provides for old-age benefit in the form of a lump-sum payment, the class of persons protected comprises all adult wage earners residing in Kenya, excluding public servants, public university employees, local authorities, members of the armed forces, national youth service and temporary residents whose residence does not exceed three years.

All employers in Kenya with five or more employees are required by law to contribute to the Fund. As at 31 December 1992, the Fund had about 21,315 contributing employers and covered nearly 2 million members. With effect from January 1988, the National Social Security Fund became a parastatal body with autonomous powers. It is presently managed by a Board of Trustees consisting of representatives from the Government, the Federation of Kenya Employers and the Central Organization of Trade Unions.

Owing to our level of economic development, we are unable to introduce payment of unemployment family benefits; moreover, other benefits can only be paid with some modifications. However, proposals for the possible conversion of the National Social Security Fund into a pension scheme, with a view to providing enhanced benefits to members, are under consideration. In this respect, the National Social Security Fund has undertaken a study with technical assistance from the UNDP and the ILO, whose primary objective is to strengthen the administrative capabilities of the Fund, and also to prepare for its future conversion into a pension scheme.

Apart from these measures, there is also the need of addressing the broader issue of the social dimension of adjustment with a view to the possible inclusion of social security considerations in all structural reforms. Given the complexity of the subject, there is an urgent need for well-trained officers to handle this process. We shall therefore continue to seek ILO technical assistance for building a national capacity in designing and implementing social policy and poverty alleviation programmes. This might require a more integrated approach to intervention in the social sector and for the development and maintenance of a long-term social protection programme for which the necessary institutional capacity would need to be developed.

My delegation notes with appreciation that three technical items are scheduled for discussion during this session of the Conference, namely the prevention of major industrial accidents, part-time work, and the role of the International Labour Organization in technical cooperation.

While my delegation looks forward to benefiting from the final conclusions and recommendations emanating from these discussions, we would like to make a few remarks regarding the item on the role of the International Labour Organization in technical cooperation. The review of this item is particularly timely, especially when one considers that technical cooperation is a major means of action for the attainment of the objectives of this Organization. The last comprehensive review on the subject took place in 1987, when the Conference adopted a resolution concerning the role of the International Labour Organization in technical cooperation. My delegation recalls that the said resolution confirmed several principles, including the need for ILO technical cooperation to be carried out in accordance with the developmental needs and priorities of developing countries and the objectives of the ILO; the need to increase national capabilities and self-reliance and to promote sustainable development; and the need for a greater measure of concentration based on the comparative advantage of the ILO, its tripartite structure and its mandate.

It should also be recalled that in recent years technical cooperation programmes have undergone fundamental changes, and hence my delegation feels that the present review will ensure that future directions of such technical cooperation will effectively respond to the new perceptions and developments occurring within the donor community and beneficiary countries. Such a review will also be necessary in view of the ILO's new active participation policy, the purpose of which is to bring the Organization closer to its constituents and enable it to respond better to their priorities and needs, thereby enhancing the Organization's relevance to its constituents.

I would also like to remark here that the fundamental purposes of the ILO as defined in its Constitution embrace a wide range of issues, including the promotion of social justice and the contribution to a lasting peace, and the right of all human beings to pursue both their material well-being and intellectual development. It is in this respect that my delegation would like to take this opportunity to remind this august Conference that the ILO has a continuing responsibility to focus serious attention on its objectives and criteria of policy, irrespective of political considerations.

Finally, the Kenya delegation warmly welcomes the Czech Republic and the Republics of Slovenia, Moldova, Croatia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Armenia and Slovakia, which have joined the ILO family since June 1992. Their decision to join the ILO has made this Organization more universal, and this will significantly contribute to its noble ideals and objectives.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – There seems to be some uncertainty concerning the closure of the list of speakers for the special session which was announced by the Chairman of the Selection Committee for Thursday, 10 June, at 3.00 p.m. The closing date for the list of speakers for that special session is in fact Tuesday, 8 June, 6.00 p.m., as indicated in the report of the Selection Committee.

Original Korean: Mr. PARK (Workers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – On behalf of the workers of the Republic of Korea, I should like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that under his wise and able leadership the debates of the Conference on the important issues of this year's agenda will prove constructive and achieve fruitful results.

Above all, I should like to thank the Director-General for his valuable Report to the Conference, particularly Part I relating to the important subject of social insurance and social protection. He deserves our special appreciation for seeking through the Report to alert all nations of the world to the current situation and the future path to be followed.

The Report sheds light on the developmental history and the current trends and problems of social insurance and social protection, and it gives me great satisfaction to be able to take part in the discussion of such a timely and significant theme. As the Report points out, the establishment and development of systems of social insurance, social security and social protection have been among the central features of social development in the twentieth century, designed to ensure social integration and the elimination of starvation and poverty. Nevertheless, while the industrialized countries are at present seeking to cut funds for social development schemes because of the adverse effect on economic growth of the sizable expenditure involved, the developing countries, following the example of the developed countries, seem inclined to reduce the development speed of social protection schemes and to reconsider the introduction of new systems.

In today's world of competition among nations in the area of development, it should be noted that the Republic of Korea has learned a valuable lesson from the social friction that arose mainly as a result of the imbalance between economic development and social development. During the 1960s and the following two decades, the Republic of Korea invested all of its energies in national economic development. As a result, we achieved a very high rate of economic growth each year, so that the Republic of Korea's economic development is now regarded as being close to the threshold of that of a developed country. However, the welfare of the workers, who made a great contribution to the process of economic growth, and the systems of social protection lagged considerably behind since the Minimum Wage Law and the National Pension Law were only introduced in the late 1980s. Such unbalanced development eventually fuelled discontent among the working class, resulting in an outbreak of unprecedented labour unrest in 1987.

However, President Kim Young-Sam's civilian Government has now assumed office in the Republic of Korea 32 years after the military coup of 1960, and has committed itself to better-balanced comprehensive development in order to heal the wounds of the past by obliterating the legacies of the ill-planned policies of the former authoritarian and economic-growth-oriented regimes. We therefore anticipate considerable benefits from the present Government's remedial measures in the field of social development.

We believe that the ILO, through its guidance and the role assigned to it, can help the new Government of the Republic of Korea to actively implement the reform policies in this field, since it is incumbent on a member State of the ILO to abide by the Constitution of the ILO, to ratify the Conventions and to improve its systems in accordance with ILO standards. We agree with the Director-General of the ILO that "better governance can create the necessary confidence in social arrangements", a view of particular relevance to the new Government of the Republic of Korea.

At the same time, we must continue to address the question of distribution of wealth, not only within countries, but in the global village. The fact is that even developed countries are at present facing serious difficulties in maintaining or enlarging the system of social protection. In the worst case, we have countries with a large proportion of the population living below the poverty line, whose national priority consists in escaping from poverty rather than in setting up social protection systems. It is no exaggeration to say that the developed countries have blocked the exit from poverty for the developing countries, as they primarily seek to protect their national interests by reinforcing protectionist trade barriers, by their reluctance to transfer technology to the developing countries and by exerting pressure for the payment of foreign debts.

Although the world has emerged from the era of political tension, these changes have been accompanied by an upsurge in economic nationalism and a trend towards regional economic groupings. The staggering of the GATT multinational trade negotiations has highlighted the sharp conflict of interests among nations. Against such an undesirable background of emerging national individualism, who can be fully confident that totalitarianism will have disappeared from the earth in the twenty-first century?

We believe that a system of social protection based on social justice is a prerequisite for the balanced development of the global family of countries of North and South, with the ultimate aim of ensuring the welfare of mankind and justice in the world. In this connection, this year's general discussion subject, "the role of the ILO in technical cooperation", will provide us with guidelines for the future and new approaches, and will pave the way for more active involvement by the developed countries in ILO programmes.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our sincere gratitude to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association and to international trade union organizations for their concern and advice regarding the security of trade union rights in the Republic of Korea. A look at the history of Korean labour law shows that such legislation was frequently subject to unilateral revision by whatever government was in power without any participation or involvement of workers in the process of law-making. It cannot be denied, however, that working conditions such as wages, working hours, working environment and so forth have been gradually improved, although there has plainly been a certain degree of restriction and control on trade union rights in respect of freedom of association. Accordingly, workers and trade unions have consistently worked for the improvement of national labour law. A welcome development has been the establishment, on the initiative of the Korean Government, of the Labour Related Law Review Commission in which representatives of workers, employers and public utilities participate. This Commission was established in April 1992 to produce a draft proposal for the revision of labour law in the light of international labour standards and on the basis of tripartite consultation and consensus. The draft proposal will subsequently be submitted to the National Assembly for endorsement. As a partner in this tripartite consultation process, my organization, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions, will do its utmost to ensure that the new labour law complies with internationally recognized standards.

In conclusion, may I say that we are looking forward to a fruitful round of discussions. I am confident that at the end of the Conference we shall be richer in knowledge and ideas for the better social protection of mankind.

Mr FOKEER (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) – Very warm and sincere greetings to the President and to the other delegates of this august assembly from the people and the Government of Mauritius. May I also join the previous speakers and extend my congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to preside over the proceedings of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I can assure him of the full cooperation of my delegation and I am confident that under his able leadership and with the support of the Vice Presidents, to whom I also extend my warm congratulations on their election, the debate and discussions on the various items on the agenda will come to fruition.

This Conference, which annually holds out the promise for a better tomorrow for the world of work, is taking place in a very particular context when the contours of a "new international economic order" are still being sketched with the European Single Market, the formation of mega trading blocks and the imminent conclusion of the GATT negotiations. This economic globalization, however, is reducing the world into an arena where competitiveness remains the sole test for survival and developing nations find themselves on a tightrope of unpopular economic reforms.

The quest for every member State to achieve higher living standards therefore becomes more and more urgent and at the same time a no less daunting challenge. Geographical and climatic setbacks place additional constraints and limit whatever options are available. In many cases, regional conflicts and other upheavals fuelled by ethnic tensions or nationalist extremism cast a shadow of gloom to make the horizon more morose and uncertain. It is therefore not surprising to find a vast majority of countries chronically facing severe problems, with economic growth lagging behind the expanding population. All these perpetual conflicts attract world attention and mobilize a lot of resources which could have been reallocated for better civilian use to improve conditions of life generally and working conditions in particular.

The twin problems of employment and poverty remain serious in many parts of the world. Employment, which is the first component of social protection, can hardly accommodate the large proportion of jobseekers. Declining per capita income is bound to lead to frustration and hardship among large numbers of people and many countries now perceive the employment situation as a security problem and, as rightly stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, it constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. The lingering crisis in the industrialized countries is having adverse effects on the developing countries. It is therefore highly desirable that a concerted solution be devised in favour of an economic upswing which would take off the pressure and provide the developing countries with the necessary confidence to master their social problems.

The dramatic end of the Cold War has ushered in a new era of democratization in politics with liberalization in economic and social affairs. This democratization process currently under way in various parts of the world knows no parallel in history.

The dilution of ideologies has led dozens of populations to aspire to political freedom and economic progress. This process is also stimulated by a change in approach by international organizations, which demand the fulfilment of certain criteria, such as the respect of basic human rights and better forms of democratic governance as preconditions for assistance. International efforts for the promotion of more democratic forms should therefore continue unabated for we, in my country, believe that democracy and freedom are the essential ingredients for human development.

Indeed, we take pride in believing that if we have managed to weather the storm and stay clear of global recession the reason is essentially our total commitment to democratic values and ideals, to the respect for human rights and to the rule of law. This democratic culture has enabled us to live in peace and tolerance, to enable entrepreneurs to thrive and to provide the workforce with a dignity they deserve.

Thus, from a single crop economy, Mauritius has managed to implement strategies aimed at investment promotion, infrastructural development and industrialization. Hence, we have succeeded in resolving our unemployment problem and we are now well placed to face future challenges with a reasonably well diversified and export-oriented economy with four main engines of growth, namely agriculture, manufacturing, tourism and services. We shall press ahead with the same will to improve continuously our development for the continued happiness of our population.

At the 73rd Session of the Conference in 1987, while examining the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, the Conference adopted a resolution calling for the active participation of the population with a view to enhancing the impact of development efforts. We are faithful to this principle in our strategy to ensure that the various sectors of our society contribute to the development process and fully share the benefits gained from development. The inclusion of an item entitled The role of the ILO in technical cooperation on the agenda of this session of the Conference at a time of economic structuring heralds a new lease of hope for the promotion of those basic ILO principles that are so important for the achievement of social improvements.

At a time when the implementation of structural adjustment programmes may undermine fundamental human rights and when the temptation is great to roll back social standards to cut down labour costs, the International Labour Organization has again very rightly signalled its intention to stand by its constituents by taking up the cause of technical cooperation. The contribution of the ILO in promoting social policy, social protection objectives and training programmes within its central mandate is extensively recognized. One must not at this stage forget the crucial role being played by the ILO in the fight against apartheid through the monitoring of the implementation of sanctions, with special attention to the steps taken to circumvent such measures.

The response of the ILO some ten years ago in presenting palatable solutions to the changes prescribed by international institutions concerning the structural pattern of our economy has largely contributed to our industrial development and economic expansion. Our Master Plan on Education, designed essentially to provide appropriate linkage between secondary schools and the world of work, bears the hallmark of technical cooperation. The Workers' Education Programme, benefiting from ILO assistance, has already completed its first phase under which more than 1,000 workers' representatives were trained in workshops. We can only plead – and I am sure that this is also the wish of the other delegates – that the ILO continues to provide integrated and comprehensive programmes responding to national needs and priorities.

Indeed, I should mention here that the ILO should make a special effort to motivate workers' representatives to adapt themselves to the new economic environment and its impact on society and on the workforce in particular. In my own country the Government has been striving towards improved relations among the social partners and the employers are following suit, even if the main reason is strictly one of labour. My Government is giving special attention to the trade union movement in forthcoming programmes to enable it to play a more effective role and the ILO should, I feel, be more aggressive in this area.

New technologies have not only brought increasing productivity but have also exposed workers to hazardous working conditions; the sequence of major industrial accidents throughout the world has become a matter of international concern. The inclusion of an item on the prevention of major industrial accidents, for a second discussion at this session, confirms the ILO's increasing attention to contain the causative factors of industrial accidents at source. The adoption of an appropriate labour instrument will, we hope, provide a systematic mechanism to prevent accidents and to mitigate the consequences of an accident, should one occur. I once again reiterate my Government's commitment to protecting the working environment to ensure a sound and sustainable development. Our commitment has clearly been expressed in our development plan which lays stress on the symbolic nature of the interaction between society and its environment, even if the level of physical pollution in Mauritius is not yet alarming.

The inclusion on the agenda of an item on part-time work is a welcome initiative as this is an issue of topical interest and great relevance to developing and industrialized nations. Part-time work is an adaptable instrument which has the merit of being able to accommodate both situations of full employment and of unemployment. On the one hand it promotes flexibility of the labour market in times of full employment by opening the way for part-timers to join the ranks of the employed, especially those unable or unwilling for domestic or social reasons to work full time. On the other hand, in depressed times it favours a sharing of employment opportunities and provides a good example of solidarity.

New methods of production also lead to the adoption of non-conventional working time arrangements to suit operational requirements. In this context, part-time work has emerged as a means of reconciling the needs and preferences of workers with operational flexibility. The concern of the ILO illustrates the pressing need for a legal framework to protect the virtues of part-time work and prevent it from sliding into a precarious form of employment. In our own case some legal constraints do not allow us to make a large-scale use of part-time work. The debate has started and the system needs to be reviewed.

Faithful to our tradition of bilingualism I should like to conclude in French by reminding all the participants of this august assembly that Mauritius will have the honour of hosting the Eighth African Regional Conference in 1994 in the best touristic region of the country. This very agreeable setting will be an opportunity to join business with pleasure and to get to know a country which has the modest ambition of becoming a showcase for this part of the world, in parliamentary democracy terms and as regards the respect of human rights, the freedom of the press and peaceful coexistence in rich cultural diversity. We sincerely hope that our welcome and hospitality will live up to your expectations and throughout the Conference we hope to be able to show you a new dimension of our determination to open up new vistas for collaboration in Africa.

Mr. TAMRAKAR (Minister of State for Labour and Industry, Nepal) – The Nepalese delegation joins the preceding speakers in extending its warmest congratulations to the President on his unanimous election and also to the other Officers of the Conference on their election. We are fully confident that under his competent and experienced guidance the deliberations of this Session will smoothly proceed to a successful conclusion.

We express our heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his unanimous re-election and will give our full support to his every endeavour in the future.

My delegation is wholeheartedly contented with the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body which have dealt with a burning problem and a vital issue of this modern time. We are looking forward to a constructive debate on this issue. Concerning the issue of the prevention of industrial disasters, my delegation feels that the life of a person is so precious that priority should be given to ensuring its safety at work and preventing industrial disasters.

The topic of part-time work assumes considerable importance in modern industrialized societies. We feel that the development of part-time work could affect the promotion of employment opportunities and efforts should be made to protect such employment through legislation.

We believe that democracy and development are interdependent and are in fact two sides of the same coin. The benefits of development cannot trickle down to the common mass unless we have a democratic government accountable to the people.

The elected Government in Nepal has initiated a series of fundamental policy reforms to create a congenial environment for growth and development. The current moves towards liberalization, privatization and the relaxation of government control through policy initiatives are some of the major steps taken in this direction. These attempts are expected to increase the competitiveness, efficiency and the productivity of the economy, which will further promote social and economic justice through growth in productivity and employment. Furthermore, the Right Honourable Mr. Girija Prasad Koirala, who was the first labour leader 50 years ago, has now become the Prime Minister and led the May Day rally this year.

The present Government is formally committed to the welfare and prosperity of the labour force. The Government also sincerely recognizes the importance of labour in the production process and its contribution to the growth of national output. We are very much aware of the fact that peace cannot exist in any part of the world where there are vast differences in the distribution of income and wealth. Experience in many developing countries has shown that the rising gulf between the haves and the have-nots poses a threat to society. Therefore due attention in this direction is needed and the proper emphasis should be placed on this subject by both industrialized and developing countries.

We are quite aware that three different actors involved in development are participating in this august forum. With the establishment of a democratic system, tripartism has been introduced. Collective bargaining is used to resolve industrial disputes. This process has helped promote good industrial relations between the workers and the employers. Cooperation and coordination among these actors should bear fruit in the task of nation-building.

Nepal has advocated policies aimed at safeguarding human rights, freedom and equality. In this context we hold in high esteem the values of human dignity, social justice and a more equitable distribution of income. To accomplish these objectives particularly in the context of the labour sector we have enacted the Trade Union Act 1992 and amended and revised the Foreign Employment Act 1985 and Bonus Act 1974. We are now in the process of finalizing this legislation. We believe that these laws and regulations will improve workers' welfare, safeguard their rights, increase productivity and maintain industrial peace and harmony.

Nepal is one of the least developed countries in the world and faces various kinds of socio-economic problems. Above all we need economic growth, and industrialization, employment and the eradication of poverty. For this, the Government has undertaken various policy incentives, including liberalization, privatization, structural adjustment programmes and foreign investment. We hope that these measures will aid the further industrialization of the country. Particular attention has been given to the implementation of legislation aimed at providing equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers.

We are very concerned about the abuse of child labour. Due to various socio-economic reasons, this phenomenon is common in developing countries. Though we are committed to the elimination of such abuse, our delegation feels that there is a need for concrete programmes to eradicate the social and economic problems.

However, we feel that a lot remains to be done in terms of addressing the problems of the labour force, particularly in developing countries. In our part of the world, the educational infrastructure is extremely poor and vocational training is inadequate, which leads to a gap between the market needs and the quality of the labour force. The role of the ILO in this regard is very important for the development of manpower. More emphasis should be placed on launching vocational skill development programmes in both qualitative and quantitative terms.

My delegation would like to draw the attention of the distinguished delegates to the issue of international migration. It can be seen that in the industrialized and fast-growing economies there seems to be a shortage of manpower, both skilled and unskilled. Positive initiatives are required to regulate and channel the flow of labour and ensure that appropriate measures are taken.

My delegation would like to reiterate that Nepal, being a least developed country, needs special assistance to accelerate its pace of development. However the resources so far allocated to our country are too meagre to meet our needs. We need increased financial and technical assistance from the various international organizations to accelerate our development efforts.

May I recall that at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference my delegation expressed the need for an ILO area office in Nepal. I hope our request will receive a favourable response.

Having said all this, we must add that the twenty-first century is only seven years away. There is a lot that we can do together to stabilize democracy and thus promote industrial development and the development of mankind as a whole. We cannot afford to remain complacent about the need to build nations. I do not see any reason why we cannot achieve this objective together before the end of the present century, if there is genuine will and commitment. We must not fail in our responsibility to pass on our heritage to the next generation.

Original Russian: Mr. MELIKIAN (Minister of Labour, Russian Federation) – First and foremost, please permit me to congratulate the President on his election to this high post and to wish him every success in chairing this session of the Conference.

We believe the subject of the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, is most topical. The Report's consideration of how social insurance systems evolve, its sharing of various countries' experience in the matter and its analysis of possible ways of tackling problems in this sphere are beyond any doubt of great interest and will be extremely useful in formulating and developing national social insurance and social protection systems in the member countries of the ILO.

In Russia, which is now undergoing radical social, economic and political transformations, there has never been any doubt about the difficulty involved in reforming the former Soviet system. The real cost of this reform, especially in the social sphere, has however turned out significantly higher than what could have been foreseen when the process began. Social assistance, social insurance and social protection are therefore all the more topical for us.

In our country, as in many other formerly socialist countries, in some respects the social insurance and social protection system was quite developed. But many of its elements were based on a different economic system, and they have required fundamental changes in the new circumstances. A number of important programmes, including unemployment insurance and health insurance, had to be completely rebuilt from square one.

These questions are also highly topical for our country because the population's real income has recently dropped dramatically. In the last year and five months, consumer prices have increased nearly 80 times, while average wages increased much more slowly. In real terms they have dropped markedly. At the same time differences between workers' wage levels have grown rapidly. Before the reforms, the ratio between the 10 per cent highest remunerations and the 10 per cent lowest was 4:5 to 5:1, while now it has reached 20:1.

A large part of the population has thus found itself well below the poverty line. Attempts to balance the state budget by reducing expenditure have had a negative effect on subsidized sectors in our country, with repercussions for workers' wages in these sectors. Ironically, many teachers', doctors', performers' and scientists' families have been among those requiring social assistance. In recent months the situation has improved somewhat. But increased subsidizing of these sectors adds to the budget deficit and has an adverse impact on inflation.

Social insurance and social protection are of growing importance to countries such as Russia because of the widescale economic restructuring going on and the conversion of enterprises in the military-industrial complex. During this process a significant increase in unemployment and bankruptcies of unprofitable enterprises is to be expected. Last year it did not occur because the State extended a great deal of credit to such enterprises.

As a result, massive plant closings, unemployment and an even worse drop in production levels were avoided. On the other hand, restructuring was slowed and there was high inflation. We now believe that a balance must be struck in assisting these enterprises. Here more than anywhere we must avoid extremes and find a happy medium. Unemployment levels must be considered one of the essential factors defining how tough monetary and credit policies can be. I am firmly convinced that because of a number of specific circumstances, the Russian reforms and incipient Russian democracy are doomed if there is an excessively high level of unemployment. But carrying on last year's policy is not the answer either. Moving the reforms ahead effectively will lead to greater unemployment, and this requires an enhanced social insurance and social protection system.

We have, albeit with some problems, endeavoured to develop a coherent system of social partnership, such as the one on which the ILO's activity is based. A general agreement has been concluded between the Government, the trade unions and employers, and collective wage agreements have been concluded at the sectoral and regional levels. It is too early to say whether the social partnership mechanism is entirely effective. But the three parties do in most cases try to cooperate. And the fact that, despite the complications of the situation, last year and this year most labour disputes have been settled at the bargaining table demonstrates that the system of social partnership is gathering strength.

The old trade unions, which previously had acted like semi-official structures, have been essentially transformed and new trade union associations have appeared and are developing. The State is trying to assist in the development of the trade union movement. We believe that a strong trade union is not an enemy of the Government, but rather a responsible and serious partner which in its work is concerned not only about short-term gains but also about the future of the enterprise, the sector and the economy as a whole, i.e. that a strong trade union is concerned about the future, and about the workers themselves.

We are counting on the active participation of our trade unions in ILO activities and hope that the ILO will provide appropriate support for our social partners. Our employers' organizations too are becoming much more active.

While we consider social insurance and social protection as one of the most important elements of social policy, at the same time we understand that conventional measures in this field do not encompass every aspect of protecting and assisting our people. It is extremely important that the State help people help themselves, by doing whatever it can to foster the development of self-employment, small businesses and entrepreneurship, and by enhancing skills and vocational know-how. Last year, unfortunately, many of these aspects were not actively supported by the Government. We now give them a great deal more importance, considering them a means of social protection and at the same time a factor for the accelerated development and growth of a market economy. There are a number of projects being considered in this field, including with the World Bank. And it is our hope that the ILO too will offer its collaboration on these questions in the future.

We greatly appreciate the ILO's work and its efforts to provide more effective cooperation to member States as they tackle problems in the social and labour sphere. We welcome the Director-General's efforts to bring the ILO's activities closer to the real needs of member States by implementing a policy of "active partnership" and by placing emphasis on regional ILO activities. At the same time, we believe that the Office and the Governing Body should genuinely monitor this decentralization and the activities of the multidisciplinary teams so that the balance of responsibility is not disturbed between the headquarters, which takes policy decisions and distributes financial resources, and the regions.

We welcome the Director-General's intention to broaden the Office's cooperation with the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, including Russia, as they implement economic reforms, with a view to easing the transition to a market economy, creating employment, assisting with the further training of supervisory staff, perfecting the industrial relations systems and strengthening social protection in accordance with ILO standards.

We are counting on greater cooperation between Russia and the ILO as regards all three social partners: the Government, workers and employers. To ensure the best possible relations with the ILO we have proposed a comprehensive approach, which provides for an agreed programme of coordination for all ILO-Russian Ministry of Labour projects. It is our hope that given the limited resources of both the Organization and our Government, this will make it possible in practice to focus on those problems of social development in our country which are of the highest priority.

In conclusion, I would like to express the wish and the hope that in our changing world the ILO will be successful in striking a balance between keeping to the tradition of the Organization and adapting its strategy, structure and mechanisms as needed.

Original Portuguese: Mr. FRANCO (Employers' delegate, Brazil) – I should first of all like to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this august assembly.

It is a particular source of pride for me to transmit to this important Conference the message of the National Confederation of Industry of Brazil – which I have the honour of presiding over – to the workers, employers and government representatives of the world who are meeting here at this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The year 1993 has been a year of major change in Brazil. Constant political tensions resulting from a very new democratic coexistence and continuing economic difficulties, which have not been resolved by either orthodox or unorthodox plans of action, have led to a process of maturing amongst the various political and social groups. The relations between workers and employers are characterized by a deepening of dialogue and collective bargaining.

The Government of President Itamar Franco, in line with a policy of indisputable austerity, is marked by clear realism in the economic sphere, an opening up of an ongoing dialogue on political issues and an evident concern for social problems, especially those of the poorest classes of the population. This strategy has produced some encouraging results.

From the economic point of view, the Brazilian entrepreneurs are gradually regaining confidence in the future. New investments and an opening up of new opportunities for work already indicate the direction toward restored growth.

In the social sphere, the calm attitude of the Ministry of Labour, under the able leadership of Minister Walter Barelli, is having a positive influence on other Government departments and on business circles, with a view to achieving economic development and resolving our inflationary crisis whilst maintaining the level of employment and protecting the purchasing power of the working classes.

At the political level, President Itamar Franco, modestly but with determination, is succeeding in motivating the various groups and parties represented in the National Congress to unite their efforts to overcome the difficulties of the country, which in turn is facilitating the approval by Parliament and implementation by the Government of structural adjustment measures which are crucial to the modernization of the Brazilian economy, such as port reform, the introduction of new legislation on industrial property and an acceleration of the privatization process.

In this message to the participants at this session of the Conference, I cannot fail to note and express the appreciation of Brazilian employers for the continuing support received from the ILO through its office in Brazil, and for the assistance provided by the Employers' Technical Cooperation section in Geneva, as well as the help they have given to the vocational training services, SENAI and SENAC, which are funded and administered by the employers.

Together with the ILO office in Brazil, we organized last March a national seminar on freedom of association and collective labour contracts which made a favourable impact in business circles.

Together with the Employers' Technical Cooperation section, we continue to carry out an annual programme of regional seminars for employers, which has also benefited from assistance from the ILO office in Lima. The subject of these seminars – social security – has aroused considerable interest among leading entrepreneurs. In 1992, we organized two such seminars in Vitória and in Florianópolis, events which we hope to repeat this year in the northern region, with meetings in Belém de Pará and Manaus.

We would also like to point out that the National Confederation of Industry is devoting special attention at the present time to the preparation of the Sixth Meeting of the Presidents of Ibero-American Employers' Organizations, which will take place in Salvador, Bahia, in the month of July of this year, simultaneously with the Ibero-American Summit of Heads of State and Government.

This meeting of entrepreneurs which, under the patronage of the International Labour Organization and the Association of Cooperation of Entrepreneurs of Europe and Latin America, is organized annually and has been very successful in consolidating private initiative in the American continent and in drawing the attention of governments, both in our region as well as in Europe, to international cooperation measures which are necessary in the interests of economic and social progress in Latin America.

At the meeting in Salvador, we hope to formulate specific proposals on vocational training, social development and privatization in Latin America, which will contribute to the adoption of programmes of action in those spheres by the Ibero-American Conference. The confirmed presence of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, Ambassador Baena Soares, will make a valuable contribution to the drawing up of these proposals.

In the last few years, the growth of poverty, even abject poverty, seems to have been more rapid than the creation and distribution of wealth. The reversal of this perverse situation is imperative in the light of the permanent threat it poses to peace.

It would be appropriate here to recall the words of Pope Paul VI, when he stated that development is the new name for peace.

Business, because of its social function in relation to the creation of jobs, technological progress and the production of vital goods indispensable for life, has an important role to play in such adverse economic circumstances.

I shall not fail to take advantage of this opportunity to express before this august Assembly the feelings held at present by Brazilian employers in particular and perhaps by the entrepreneurial class in Latin America as a whole. This feeling can be summed up in two words – hope and optimism.

The setbacks of the last few years have convinced us that our future depends substantially on our own creative capacity because, despite all the difficulties – both internal and external – Brazil and Latin America are economically viable, and it is for the entrepreneurial classes to take up the role of providing the driving force for development.

We are aware of the fact that we shall not solve our problems without much hard work and major efforts to improve the quality of our products and by seeking to be truly competitive. This will be possible only if we share the fruits of our progress with the working classes, by investing in their vocational training and by setting up development programmes and projects to eradicate poverty and health and social programmes to improve the quality of life and well-being of all. We are also aware of the fact that we can expect no miracles from the State nor from the developed countries, which themselves are facing serious internal problems compounded by the pressure from the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe. We recognize the fact that the workers appear to share our feelings on these matters and that we can mutually help each other.

On the other hand, what we do hope for from the international community and the bodies of the United Nations family, including the ILO itself, is a legal framework which will ensure the free access of our products and services to international markets, as we simultaneously open up our markets to our competitors and their products.

This legal framework presupposes that the standards governing international trade, both those set up by bodies of the United Nations family as well as those emanating from certain countries or groups of developed countries, are absolutely neutral from the point of view of their influence on the free circulation of goods.

The resources allocated to international technical cooperation will be to no avail if the national economies of our continents continue to drain themselves by establishing and working within the framework of disadvantageous trading conditions, and if access to international markets continues to suffer from protectionist measures.

I had the opportunity of referring, at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development at Rio de Janeiro last year, to something which I wish to reaffirm, namely that sustainable development depends on cooperation by all nations and on a relinquishing of all forms of egoism, and this means first and foremost the establishment of a more equitable international order. I hope that the Conference will adopt conclusions which reflect these ideals.

My organization is deeply dedicated to the modernization of the structure of the ILO. At the session in 1979 we supported the resolution on employment, believing that the best form of creating jobs is to create enterprises.

And during this session of the Conference, we shall pay great attention to the transformations which are absolutely essential here in the ILO if we are to find ourselves in a more positive situation in the present economic circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS (representative of Education International) – As the representative of the first international workers' organization to address this session of the Conference, may I say that we warmly welcome the election of a person with the President's standing and experience in the trade union movement, and we express our sincere congratulations.

Education International was formed in January this year by the amalgamation of two organizations which had long enjoyed relations with the ILO. With nearly 20 million members in 120 countries, the new organization is one of the largest International Trade Secretariats associated with the ICFTU, and is growing rapidly.

May I express our appreciation of the decision of the Governing Body last week to recognize Education International.

Teachers and other education employees occupy a strategic position in every society. The majority of our members are public employees and we work closely with sister organizations representing the public sector. We firmly support the positions put forward, for example, by the Public Service International.

Teachers and other education employees are on the front line as nations undergo structural adjustment. We consider the resolution adopted by the last session of the International Labour Conference concerning adjustment and human resources development to be one of the most important resolutions adopted by an international body in recent times. The decision of the United Nations General Assembly to convene a World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995 is more than timely. We firmly support the decision of the Governing Body to ensure that the ILO makes a strong contribution to the Summit and the action taken by the Director-General to this end.

The Social Summit provides all nations with an opportunity to focus on the ultimate purpose of economic policies, which is human well-being. Human well-being encompasses many things – education for all, employment for all, social protection and respect for basic human rights. Any set of economic policies which does not advance human society towards these goals – for all people, not just a few – fails the test.

One of the problems about the policies pursued by governments in industrialized and developing countries alike during the past decade or so, is that economic policies, economic models, which should have been considered as a means to an end seem rather to have become the end in themselves.

The experience of structural adjustment exemplifies the problem. By adjusting the structures of society to solve economic problems, economics has become the end rather than the means. The Social Summit will help all concerned – governments and the social partners – to re-establish the focus on economics as the means not the end.

Moreover, as the ICFTU has pointed out in its paper entitled North-South linkages and global unemployment, a renewed focus on social goals provides the best prospect for replacing the vicious circle in which so many of our societies are now trapped with a virtuous circle in which improved productivity will go hand in hand with greater well-being.

There is no better example of this vital point than education, which seems all too often to be perceived by the macroeconomists of the International Monetary Fund and of many governments as solely a consumption item – an item on the national accounts.

Yes, our national societies do have to allocate substantial resources to education. The essential point, however, is that education should never be considered as only a consumption item. Education is essentially an investment item, an investment in the future of each nation, an investment in the future of humanity as a whole.

Take another issue upon which the ILO can make a major contribution to the Social Summit – the issue of child labour. The ILO is doing excellent work on this problem and is the only source of reliable worldwide information on its extent. It is simply not acceptable that at the end of the twentieth century hundreds of millions of children are being exploited, usually under the most appalling conditions, when they should be at school. And I am sure that everybody in this room agrees. No economist's model, no macroeconomic analysis, no structural adjustment programme can possibly justify a continuation of this exploitation, the degradation of young bodies and minds and the deprivation of children's right to education; the deprivation of their right to have a future, to have hope.

When our members, like other workers, campaign against structural adjustment and its consequences in their countries, it has to be understood that they are campaigning against this kind of exploitation.

Yes, our members are up in arms over reductions in their inadequate salaries. Yes, our members in Africa are saying that it is unacceptable for them to receive their salaries three, four and six months late, and sometimes not at all. Yes, our members are up in arms at having to take second or third jobs just to feed their families when they would rather concentrate on providing education for young people and children. Yes, of course our members are fighting for a recognition of their right to a decent standard of living and a status commensurate with the teachers' role in society. But it is much more than that. Our members are also fighting for those who do not have the capacity to organize – the children. We are fighting for their future.

So it is doubly hard for our members to stomach the fact that the reaction to their campaigns for greater investment in public education is all too often to strip away the rights of teachers and other education employees to organize into independent trade unions controlled democratically by their own memberships. Their freedom of association and their right to collective bargaining is being stripped away in too many countries, essentially because our members have dared to challenge narrowly conceived and regressive economic policies.

The dramatic increase in freedom of association cases regarding teachers is a direct result of the attempts by governments to strip away their fundamental rights which are guaranteed in international labour Conventions. This increase in violations in our sector, the education sector, is a direct result of economics prevailing over norms which have the force of international law. The debate has to be shifted. The whole paradigm has to be shifted. That is one of the essential purposes of the World Social Summit, and we trust that it will be one of the outcomes, in fact the most important outcome.

The ILO has reaffirmed the increasing importance of education and training and of respect for international labour standards in the education sector, by its recent decisions to maintain a high priority for the work of the new committee on teachers. Preparation for the next meeting of the committee in 1995 will certainly be one of the highest priorities for Education International.

The Committee of Experts on the application of the ILO/UNESCO Recommendation on the Status of Teachers adopted almost 30 years ago has also done invaluable work. The studies now being conducted by that committee, for example on participation, could not be more timely, and the next meeting in 1994 will probably be the most important in its history. The series of subregional seminars on implementation of this recommendation is proving to be highly successful and must be continued.

Like other international workers' organizations, we are ready to participate in the debate on the future role of the ILO, but I must state at the outset that we believe it would be a crime of lèse-majesté to throw out the baby with the bath water. By that I mean to throw out the immensely valuable work of the ILO in setting standards and providing technical advice to governments on legislative and other measures to ensure respect for those standards and in maintaining a mechanism of worldwide reputation to monitor their implementation and to expose their violation. Any proposal to turn the ILO into some kind of agency solely for the promotion of employment is missing the point entirely and will be self-defeating. The promotion of employment goes hand in hand with respect for standards. The topic of part-time work being studied at this Conference is a case in point. It demonstrates the constructive role which the ILO plays through its unique tripartite structure in promoting social dialogue on an issue affecting the lives of many millions of families. This study is of direct concern to many of our members, the majority of whom are women, for, provided the appropriate guarantees are put in place, part-time work may provide opportunities to combine fulfilling and socially valuable employment with family responsibilities. Similarly, technical cooperation has to be seen in its broadest context. It would be an enormous mistake to try to narrow technical cooperation solely to the question of employment, important as that is. The ILO's role in technical cooperation encompasses many kinds of advice and we would like to see even more emphasis placed on equality issues, including training courses designed specifically for women.

The real question we must ask ourselves is the following: Have the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Constitution of the ILO stood the test of time? We believe the answer is a resounding yes. In a world undergoing great changes, social, technological, economic and political, changes equivalent to those experienced at the time of the Industrial Revolution, it is in the interest of all working men and women, those who employ them and the governments, that those principles be reexamined – yes – but even more that those principles be put into practice.

Original Spanish: Mr. ROSAS (Government delegate, Panama) – I am most gratified and honoured, as Minister of Labour and Social Welfare of Panama, to attend once again the International Labour Conference of which our country is proud to be one of the founding Members. I should like to extend to Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak our congratulations on his election to preside over our deliberations. I should also like to extend greetings to the Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates attending this Conference.

I am gratified to see amongst us the new States which have recently joined the ILO, and I should like to extend our greetings and a cordial welcome to their representatives.

The Director-General's Report deals with social insurance and social protection and with the role that the ILO can play in contributing to the improvement and efficiency of existing social security systems in its member States, and particularly in the developing countries. In this connection, I should like to refer to the social security system of the Republic of Panama, which was established in 1941; our Constitution enshrines the right of every individual to a basic standard of living and to social security services administered by an autonomous official body composed of representatives of the Government, employers and workers, covering sickness, maternity, invalidity, family benefits, old age, widows, orphans, forced unemployment, occupational accidents and diseases, and all the other contingencies that are generally covered by social security. The reason for this is that in the Government's social policy the aspects linked to social security constitute a substantial part of the protection provided for the various contingencies and social risks; this protection is an inalienable human right, as was recognized by the Ibero-American Presidents who attended last year's Summit in Madrid.

With regard to health, Panama considers it an essential function of the State to ensure the health of the population and to protect, to promote, to preserve and restore health, understood as physical and mental well-being. It is also the State's duty to develop a national food and nutrition policy for the entire population, to protect the health of mothers, children and adolescents, to fight communicable diseases by ensuring a healthy environment and the provision of free and comprehensive health services, including the provision of medicines for the neediest sectors of the population.

The rate of contributions for sickness, maternity, invalidity, old age and survivors' schemes is 7.25 per cent from the worker's wage, with an additional 10.75 per cent covered by the employer; in addition, the State contributes from specific taxes and other revenues provided by law. Entitlement to old-age pension begins at 60 years of age for men and 55 for women after only 180 monthly contributions.

I am glad to inform you in this connection of the recent agreement on social security negotiated by the labour ministers of the Ibero-American countries and signed by the Heads of State at their Summit in Madrid in July 1992. The agreement now awaits ratification by Parliaments in accordance with their respective constitutional procedures. The agreement is of great value and importance in the social field because it promotes and gives impetus to the development of social security schemes at a critical time in their history. It clearly respects the principle of the State's responsibility to ensure the well-being of the population, with due regard for the circumstances and situation of each nation, within a framework of regional cooperation geared towards strengthening social security and a more propitious international situation.

In this respect, the ILO can contribute to improvements and greater efficiency in the social security systems of developing countries by providing guidance and assistance to the countries such as our own, which need it so urgently.

As part of its social and labour policy, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare is responsible for the provision of social assistance to the most needy sectors of our population, and for providing care and financial assistance to asylums, orphanages, homes for children, adolescents and the disabled, covering more than 60 institutions that provide care to thousands of persons. In addition, the Ministry supports 88 centres for child guidance which provide care for more than 2 000 minors daily, thereby assisting the disabled and working mothers with children under five-and-a-half years of age.

The serious economic, social and moral crisis brought on by the dictatorship in its last years, led to a drop in GDP of 18 per cent in 1988 and 1989, with extremely serious consequences for unemployment, which rose to 25 per cent. As a result of the policies of the democratic government in its first three years, the economy grew by 4.6 per cent in 1990, 9.3 per cent in 1991 and 8 per cent in 1992, while unemployment dropped to 13.6 per cent, according to the latest household survey conducted at the end of 1992.

As an immediate result of this change, Panama fully observes the fundamental rights of workers in accordance with its Constitution, with legislation that establishes freedom of association, the right to strike, collective bargaining, minimum wages with periodical adjustments, maternity protection for working women with compulsory rest periods with pay during pregnancy and nursing, free vocational training for workers, trade union training, and the regulation of industrial relations on the basis of social justice, with special state protection for the workers.

Our work in the Ministry since early 1990 has included the protection of workers' rights as defined in existing labour legislation, which establishes the respect of the dignity of the worker and adequate conditions of health, job security, one month paid annual leave for every 11 months of service, compensation for unjustified dismissals, a 13th month of pay, seniority bonuses, paid sick leave and wage increments for overtime and mixed and night work which can amount to 43 per cent of the basic wage.

In the same period we have recognized 21 trade union organizations, two federations and two confederations, thus increasing the number of workers' organizations to seven confederations, 22 federations and 164 active trade unions, represented and coordinated by the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO), in accordance with special rules provided for in the Labour Code.

Within this context, and as a concrete reflection of the understanding and cooperation we have always promoted among the different sectors of production, we point with satisfaction to the 32 collective agreements that have been negotiated in the first five months of this year; we estimate that by the end of the year that figure will rise to around 100.

After ten years without any revision of the minimum wage, the Government proceeded, in accordance with the law and with ILO Conventions, and on the basis of in-depth studies concerning the economic and social situation of the country, to issue Decree No. 70 of 16 December 1992, which, on average, raised the national minimum wage by 21.5 per cent, one of the largest increases in the history of minimum wage reviews; our minimum wage is now one of the highest in Latin America. The measure benefited more than 45,000 workers, and represented an increase of approximately 15 million dollars a year.

Despite this positive labour situation in the country, there are external factors which can have adverse effects on it and which are a source of concern for our Government. Therefore, on behalf of my country, I should like to express before this assembly, which promotes and monitors workers' rights, our deepest and most energetic rejection of the measures adopted by certain member States of this Organization which belong to the European Economic Community – measures which have adverse effects on the economy and well-being of workers in Panama and Central America.

In this regard, I should like to endorse the complaint presented by the Panamanian Banana Workers' Trade Union against the Member States of the European Economic Community which, by means of Regulation CE404/93 of 13 February 1993, adopted measures which are in breach of ILO Convention

No. 122, to which they are all signatories. This regulation provides for a system for marketing bananas which is incompatible with free trade, discriminates among States, infringes international agreements and, through a very complex licensing system, favours the monopolistic interests of a small group of European importers, thus affecting one of the major job-producing activities in agriculture in Central and South America. Clearly, as the Panamanian trade unions said when they denounced this practice to the office for human rights, such action will curtail growth, education and the living standards of our workers, and will thus lead to increases in unemployment and labour instability.

Lastly, we are well aware of the new role of the State, and aware also that democracy is not something abstract which inevitably accompanies free elections, but rather a process which is built day by day and which grows stronger as a people proves able to solve its own problems.

Since our administration came to office, we have promoted participation and dialogue. Thus, we have seen the initial mistrust and scepticism of employers and workers fade, as they now show a greater interest in dialogue, and the will to reach understanding and achieve progress towards common goals. Little by little, on all sides, both in public opinion and within the Government, the conviction has spread that the best way we have as a nation to solve our social and labour problems, without calling workers' rights into question, is to try to reach a consensus through ongoing and open dialogue aimed at improving the general conditions and standards of living of the Panamanian people.

Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President, as well as the three Vice-Presidents, on their election.

I would also like to extend my sincerest gratitude to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, and to his staff for their effort in preparing a comprehensive Report, Social insurance and social protection as well as on The role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

With regard to social security, the years 1992 and 1993 are very significant for Indonesia. In 1992 the Indonesian Government passed two laws: Act No. 3 on workers' social security and Act No. 11 on pension funds. The social security programme, as stipulated in Act No. 3 of 1992, is a refinement and extension of the workers' social security scheme which has been implemented in Indonesia since 1977. The scheme comprises four interrelated programmes, namely employment accident benefits, death benefits, retirement benefits and medical care insurance. This programme is also aimed at improving the welfare of the workers and their families. It is the Government's view that workers are entitled to these four benefits and, consequently, employers in Indonesia are under obligation to implement this programme.

Although Act No. 11 of 1992 on pension funds has only just come into effect, numerous enterprises have already applied similar programmes through collective labour agreements or by virtue of company regulations. With the entry into force of this Act and the implementation of this programme, social security provisions as well as conditions for workers and their families will certainly be improved. It is gratifying to note that the President of the Republic of Indonesia attached great importance to this matter. On the occasion of the announcement of the 5 million membership of this programme early this year, His Excellency President Suharto launched a national movement in favour of the social security programme. In addition, Indonesia is honoured to host the general assembly of the International Social Security Association in 1995. This occasion should encourage us further to enhance our efforts to improve social welfare in Indonesia through the social security programme.

We are very pleased to affirm that the Government of Indonesia has been consistent in implementing three basic principles in our national development, namely by guaranteeing income distribution, stimulating growth and maintaining stability. Based on these three principles, the course of development during the past 21 years in Indonesia has been successful in improving the quality of life of the people. Aside from our Government's capacity to implement the principle of the market economy, the country's economy has developed through participation in the international world market, the appropriate use of modern technology and the mobilization of affordable domestic and foreign resources.

However, in spite of the considerable results achieved, we are still preoccupied with and continue to be confronted with great challenges with respect to manpower problems. Among these problems are: firstly, the fact that the current social security programmes for workers and the pension schemes are based on a relatively low level of wages, therefore, we should gradually increase the latter in such a way that the benefit derived from the social security programmes and pension allowances will also be higher.

Secondly, until recently, the social security and pension scheme programmes we have mentioned have covered only salaried workers. Therefore, there is a need for efforts to be made to extend this programme so as to include workers categorized as self-employed or family workers. In view of the fact that one of the main priorities in the next five years' development plan is to increase the number of self-employed workers, programmes should aim to help this category of worker.

Thirdly, there are approximately 2.5 million new jobseekers each year entering the labour market. In this respect, our Government should make every effort to create new and productive employment opportunities and to improve the quality of life of the entire population. Therefore, national manpower planning, vocational training and apprenticeship programmes, as an integral part of national development planning, will be continually reinforced.

We are also particularly keen to strengthen our economic and technical cooperation with non-aligned and other developing countries. At the same time we believe that it is essential to maintain good relations with developed countries. Indonesia is facing many problems, which we share with the non-aligned and other developing countries. Therefore, in order to ensure equity and justice in the world, the ILO and the developed countries should pay more attention to and give greater opportunities to the developing countries which are still facing such problems. Allowing the gap to widen between countries will worsen the state of the world's economy, including that of the developed and developing countries.

and protectionist measures taken by a number of developed countries will surely exacerbate difficulties in international trade. In this respect, we should avoid this august organization being used as a trial forum on the application of standards. Conversely, it is my sincere hope that the technical cooperation within the ILO could be directed at improving the capacity of all member countries to implement existing standards. Therefore, the distinguished experts of the ILO should be able to interpret and bridge the gap between different perceptions regarding the implementation of standards. This is a basic principle which has motivated our sponsorship of a draft resolution on the application of standards. We would greatly appreciate the strong support of the distinguished delegates to this session of the Conference.

My delegation also attaches great importance and will actively participate in the work of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Accidents, the Committee on Part-Time Work and other committees. Through these forums, we are anxious to develop fruitful cooperation with all non-aligned developing and developed countries alike. By the same token, we are eager to learn and to take advantage of these forums for the development of our country.

I am fully confident that under the able leadership of our President our expectations will be realized.

Mr. ELLAH (Secretary for Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – On behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria and my delegation, I sincerely congratulate the President on his unanimous election as the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his reappointment as the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

The theme of the Director-General's Report to the Conference, namely Social insurance and social protection, is topical and relevant to one of the most urgent issues of our day. Most of these issues actually began with the Industrial Revolution in what are now the developed countries of the world and were exported to the present developing countries along with imperialism and colonialism. The Director-General's Report draws attention to the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO adopted in 1919 and to the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944 advocating decisive measures for the protection of the workers. The ILO clearly recognized the need for improvements "in the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of employment" and the United Nations declared these improvements to be "a solemn obligation ... to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve ... the extension of social security measures to provide basic income to all in need of such protection; comprehensive medical care; and adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations". In 1948 the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which appears to me to be the crowning glory of the social protection provisions. As emphasized by the Director-General in his Report, and I quote: "Access to social protection is a basic human right, as well as a measure of human welfare, and its promotion will require normative actions – on the part of governments, the social partners and the ILO – as well as technical assistance concerning the structure and development of the schemes themselves."

The structural adjustment programmes currently being implemented in many developing countries, including Nigeria, have in the short run brought about much social distress, large-scale unemployment, rapidly falling standards of living and abject poverty in numerous instances. Consequently, there is a grave danger of serious social unrest unless we are able to take adequate measures towards effective social insurance and protection in aid of the silent majority of our country's men and women caught in this peculiar dilemma.

In Nigeria the National Provident Fund Act of 1961 which provides for contributory schemes with matching grants in the private sector has been frequently amended to adapt its provisions to the realities of the day. We are most grateful to the ILO and its high-level experts for the assistance and cooperation given to us during the course of these amendments and adaptations. The Nigerian National Provident Fund has now been transformed into a limited social security scheme with an increased variety of benefits for contributors. At present, there are plans to extend the application of the Fund to the public sector but, in the meantime, the Government has introduced indexation of benefits paid to retiring public officials as a means of ensuring that the purchasing power of the benefits are not eroded by rapid devaluation and inflation.

Apart from the National Provident Fund Act, there is also the Workmen's Compensation Act which provides generous benefits as compensation in cases of industrial accidents resulting in occupational disease, injury or death. Under our health care programmes our public officials receive free medical treatment in government hospitals and others pay only nominal charges. Arrangements are in progress for the introduction of a limited health insurance scheme to serve the whole community.

Our Directorate for Food, Roads and Rural Infrastructure (DFRRI) and our Better Life for Rural Women Programmes provide different forms of social protection and social development for our rural communities. Our National Directorate of Employment (NDE) grapples with the problem of high unemployment, particularly as it affects young persons and unskilled school-leavers. In addition, it is observed that the masses of our population who are engaged in agriculture are largely underemployed. The NDE is striving to embark on a unique new programme known as "Mass Agricultural Programme (MAP)" in which necessary inputs, sufficient for 1 acre per farmer, are supplied in kind as loan to the farmer and the value recovered from him at the end of the farming season. It is envisaged that the programme will increase our GDP and per capita income several times, thereby reducing inflation and devaluation and stabilizing the economy.

Above all, it is probably true to say that it is mainly the traditional community support system, mentioned by the Director-General in his Report, in which everyone is his brother's keeper that has sustained the society with its teeming population against all odds, notably the vagaries of the international pricing of our primary products and the crippling debt burden.

Just now, we are striving to achieve correct pricing of our petroleum products supplied to the domestic market. The problems appear endless, coming from all imaginable directions; but we are determined to succeed in the end, given the assistance and cooperation of independent international organizations such as the ILO. We hope that such organizations will remain ever impartial, objective, devoted and dedicated to the cause of truth, justice and equity, in the true spirit of the Charter of the United Nations, which enjoins national and individual equality and brotherly protection of the poor and needy everywhere. I feel confident that our crusade for reparation and debt reduction or cancellation will be better appreciated when it is realized that we are doing all in our power towards the economic and social well-being of our society. On their part, the industrialized and powerful nations of the world should always conduct our bilateral and multilateral affairs in a manner that will be generally conducive to social and economic protection everywhere in the globe in the interest of mutual understanding, human progress and international peace and concord.

Original Lao: Mr. SISOULITH (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Lao People's Republic) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election. I have great pleasure in leading the delegation of the Lao People's Democratic Republic (PDR) to this session, which represents an opportunity for tripartite representation of member States to discuss labour matters.

Peace is the desire of all humanity. Creativity, life and growth depend on the possibility for people to work peacefully. So the main tasks in the struggle for peace and in the tireless efforts of the ILO for more than 70 years are reflected in legislation in the interest of all peoples of the world, and in particular the workers.

The International Labour Organization was set up to bring governments, employers and trade unions together for united action in the cause of social justice and better living conditions everywhere, and for the people of the entire world, including the Lao people. The Lao PDR is one of the oldest member States of the ILO: it became a member almost 30 years ago. Although our country has participated in the Conference irregularly, we have nevertheless tried our best and have done many things and fulfilled many obligations, as have other member States. In addition, we have also ratified some of the international labour Conventions which are reflected in our country both in practice and in our national legislation. We understand that the ILO has done much and has attempted to bring about a system where there will be better protection of the legitimate rights and benefits of workers, creating better living and working conditions to guarantee the social welfare and employment opportunities of people throughout the world.

The Lao Government is paying increasing attention to labour administration in order to protect the rights and interests of working people, and is extending protection for older working people. The Lao Government has promulgated labour laws and is going to pass a further law in the near future. We consider that the workers are the capital of socio-economic development of the country.

Because of the very important role of labour administration for the socio-economic development of the country within a new economic framework, and with the opening-up to foreign investment, the Government has to pay much more attention to protecting rights and benefits of workers. It has to set up an appropriate organization responsible for such matters as labour policy, labour administration, working conditions, safety and health of workers, employment services, vocational training and skill development. In February of this year, the Lao Government decided to create the Labour and Social Welfare Ministry, which has an important role and responsibility in implementing the tasks I have mentioned in order to guarantee the supply of manpower for the national socio-economic development plan from now until the year 2000 and beyond, besides being responsible for some elements of the human resources development plan of our country.

The People's Democratic Republic of Lao is a small country and is the only landlocked country in South East Asia. But it has borders with several big nations in an area which has a variety of economic levels and economic development, an area where we find China, Thailand, Vietnam, Myanmar and Cambodia, with an area of 236,800 square kilometres. The population has been estimated at 4.2 million, with a population density of 17 inhabitants per square kilometre and an estimated growth rate of 2.6 per cent per year.

The Lao PDR has a young population, about 44 per cent being under 15 years of age and half the population between 15 and 59 years of age. Only 6 per cent are 60 years and over. Women make up more than half of the total population. A basic economy of over 85 per cent is engaged in scattered agricultural activity.

The Lao Government intends to implement changes in socio-economic development. The growth of the domestic product rate is now about 7 per cent per year.

The Government is giving priority to educational development, public health and culture and is also paying more attention to upgrading the quality of education and to improvements in labour and social welfare matters in which human resources development is also a priority. Based on an objective analysis the Government gives guidelines as to the actual situation of the country and has set guidelines also for socio-economic development from now until the year 2000. These guidelines are as follows: (1) Regarding the structure of the economic sector, we must establish the agro-forestry structure linked to industry and services. However, in the immediate future we must consider among the first priorities work in agro-forestry development, which is closely linked to the processing industry. (2) We must continue to promote the market economy which comprises many forms of ownership and organization. The market economy structure is composed of many levels working conjointly to expand and maximize the national potential in business production under state supervision.

Simultaneously, an economic structure for various sectors and branches is being created. We are creating an infrastructure which takes into consideration the different zones of the country based on the special features of each area, so that development takes place simultaneously in the plains, the highlands and the mountain areas.

We must increase mutually beneficial cooperation, which is our constant and long-term policy.

The objective of the socio-economic development of the country is the prosperity of our ethnic groups and the wealth and strength of the country. Human resources development is one of the main guidelines of socio-economic development and we must pay more attention to it in order to build a good quality of manpower to support the need of economic development.

At present, the demand for skilled labour in different industries and occupations contributing to socio-economic development is increasing rapidly. So it is very necessary for us to provide a training programme in accordance with the general demand for manpower, including labour supply to satisfy the needs of the foreign investors in our country. We are considering the creation of an employment service agency, a skilled labour development centre and a labour dispute settlement agency. On the other hand, we must lay down a suitable and complete labour policy to ensure social security for government employees and workers.

All problems concerning labour matters are new tasks for us to focus upon and are also an entirely new domain for us. For this reason, we need more technical and financial assistance from friendly countries and international organizations, particularly the ILO, which will help us to improve labour administration systems and build up the capacity of our specialists in order to meet the demands of the labour market of the country both at present and in the future.

On the occasion of this session of the Conference, on behalf of the Lao Government, I would like to express my thanks and gratitude to the ILO for its technical and financial assistance and support to the Lao People's Democratic Republic in the past, all of which has been a valuable contribution for the socio-economic development of my country, and I would also like to thank friendly countries and other international organizations for their assistance.

In conclusion, I wish the Conference success in meeting its significant aims. I also look forward to an expansion and continuation of our good relationship, cooperation and friendship in the future.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself, it is a great privilege to associate myself with the other speakers in offering sincere congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents, including my friend Mr. Bustos and my esteemed countryman, Mr. Ashraf Tabani, representing the Employers' group, and all those who have the honour to preside over this great forum.

May I also take this opportunity to convey fraternal greetings on behalf of the working class of Pakistan and myself to all esteemed participants, in particular the members of the Workers' group, who have conferred upon me honour by selecting me as one of the officers of the Workers' group.

We appreciate the work of the members of the Governing Body headed by Mr. Vargas Campos and Mr. Oechslin, and particularly of the Workers' group ably led by Sister Shirley Carr and Brother Eddie Laurijssen.

We welcome the admission into our Organization of the following States: the Republic of Moldova, the Republic of Croatia, the Republic of Armenia, the Czech Republic, and the Republic of Azerbaijan, Viet Nam, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan and the Republic of Slovakia.

On behalf of the working class of Pakistan and myself, we offer sincere congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his very deserved, unanimous re-election by the Governing Body as Director-General of the International Labour Office for a further period of five years commencing in March 1993. We wish him success in leading this great Organization to fulfil its historic mandate for the well-being of working men and women all over the world, and assure him of our complete support.

We had the privilege of receiving the visit of Mr. Michel Hansenne in February 1993, when he addressed a mass rally of the workers organized by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions. His message was warmly welcomed not only by the working class of Pakistan but also by the other constituents of tripartism, namely the Government and the employers, and it also reached other segments of society through extensive coverage in the media.

The Director-General has chosen an important subject for his Report this year, namely social insurance and social protection, and he has rightly concluded on page 82 that "governments have a fundamental responsibility to ensure a basic standard of living for their people". He further stresses that "access to social protection is a basic human right as well as a measure of human welfare" and therefore urged on page 6 of the Report that "the extension of social schemes in developing countries is part and parcel of the broader issue of economic, political and social development". These declarations are in line with the basic principle of the ILO contained in the ILO Constitution as far back as 1919, committing itself to the need for improvements in "the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment" and "provision for old age and injury", as well as in the 1944 Declaration of Philadelphia, which recognizes the solemn obligation of the ILO to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve the extension of social security measures to provide a basic income to all in need of such protection and comprehensive medical care and adequate medical protection for the life and health of the workers in all occupations. These two fundamental declarations have been reaffirmed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations in 1948.

The Director-General rightly pointed out the problems being faced because of economic constraints by the Third World countries in applying the scheme to the population. On page 44 the Report notes that "there has not appeared a ready means of extending the limits of what is possible to those outside formal urban employment, and the situation has become worse with the decline of formal employment, rapid urbanization and, in many countries, the continuing dissolution of traditional systems of social support".

The situation prevailing in the Third World countries in the form of the economic and social suffering of most of their population is extremely serious. Some 1.4 billion people lack even access to clean water supplies and 2.3 billion have no sanitation facilities. Thirty-three million children died last year from waterborne diseases. There are more than 1,800 million people living without health services and

1,300 million people living below the poverty line, mostly in the rural areas. The literacy rate in the least developed countries is only 34 per cent; 1 billion people are illiterate, of whom nearly 620 million are women; and the number of unemployed people is rising at the rate of 36 million every year. It is already more than 750 million.

In order to promote the concept of social insurance and social protection, there is now a need to take radical measures both at the national and international level, not only to alleviate poverty and mitigate the economic and social hardships of most of the world's population, which lives in Third World countries, but also to provide the facilities of social insurance and social protection.

At the national level the following measures are needed: strengthening the concept of participatory democracy by developing strong democratic political, social and economic institutions, including political parties with grass roots, workers' and rural workers' organizations and employers' organizations, an independent press and judiciary and a sovereign Parliament and the holding of fair elections at all levels, the accountability of public representatives, and transparent and efficient administrative machinery, the allocation of adequate funds for human resources development and the elimination of the abuse of child labour. Women and the rural poor should be supported and feudalism abolished in the rural areas. Access to land, resources and know-how should be given to the landless peasants and the population explosion should be controlled. Industrial infrastructure should be developed, employment should be provided for the young and labour relations should evolve with respect for trade union rights, through a team spirit and the improvement of the working and living conditions and sharing of the fruits of productivity equitably by the workers, employers and society at large. Social security should be provided, including in cases of deregulation and the privatization policy pursued by the Third World countries under pressure from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. This can be done in the form of job protection for workers and a social safety net, retraining, insurance and social protection.

At the international level, there is a need to relieve the sufferings of the Third World countries against high foreign debt burdens and unfavourable terms of international trade and technology transfers, to develop the infrastructure in those countries instead of increasing the resources being squandered in building weapons. For example, at present the four-fifths of the world's population living in Asia, Africa and Latin America receive only 13 per cent of the total world income, while the 20 per cent of the poorest receive only 1.3 per cent of the income and account for a 1 per cent share of global trade.

By contrast, in recent years developing countries have had to make a net debt-related transfer of nearly 40 billion US dollars per year to the developed countries, and there is no hope of a reversal of this flow. The price of 33 commodities (excluding oil) was 33 per cent lower in real terms in 1988 than it was in 1979-81.

In such a context, it is the duty of the developed nations to fulfil their human obligations to assist Third World nations to ease their foreign debt burden, provide fair return for their commodities, roll back protectionism against their exports and transfer technology and real resources and know-how to the Third World countries. This will eliminate the pollution of poverty and the economic and social suffering of their people. The ILO stands for the principle that poverty anywhere constitutes danger to prosperity everywhere.

We trust that the ILO, unique in its tripartite character, will vigorously contribute through its technical cooperation programme as well as with other United Nations bodies and world financial institutions including the World Bank and the IMF to promoting these objectives so that the workers of both the urban and the rural sectors in the Third World may have the opportunity to fulfil their dreams of reaching a basic living standard and obtaining social insurance and social protection. At present, it is a very limited segment of the working population that enjoys such rights, and in the formal sectors only.

We also fully support the important role of the supervisory machinery of the ILO in the interpretation and implementation of international labour standards, and we reaffirm the principle that the basic human rights of ILO standards are universal and should be respected by all nations, in the south, north, west and east.

In Pakistan there are areas in our labour legislation which need to be brought into conformity with ILO Conventions, particularly in respect of freedom of association and collective bargaining rights for radio and TV workers, and labour legislation must be updated to cope with the modern technological working environment in line with the ILO Convention on occupational safety and health.

In our country the social security scheme covers industrial workers and includes the provision of medical facilities, employment injury and sickness benefits for a limited period, survivors' pensions, disability pensions, and old-age pensions to which employers contribute a percentage of the basic pay of the worker. The old-age scheme is being also financed out of the federal budget of the Government of Pakistan. We are demanding that the pension rate be index-linked to inflation and that the revision date back to 1989.

As a result of negotiations between workers' organizations and the federal Government, the Prime Minister of Pakistan has revised the minimum wage for unskilled workers by means of legislation passed by Parliament. Unskilled workers will receive Rs 1,500 from 1 July 1992. Social insurance and social protection will also be revised, and educational opportunities for workers' children will be improved. A revision of the rates of compensation for workers in the event of disability following an industrial accident is being discussed by the National Assembly. We hope that the restoration of the National Assembly will expedite the passage of legislation. This is welcomed by the working class and the people as a whole as an historical step to strengthen the democratic and constitutional norms in the country.

May I also take the opportunity to convey our appreciation of the work of the ILO in various fields, including workers' education, improving working conditions, employment, human resources development, industrial relations, migration, the work of the International Institute for Labour Studies, and the ILO Turin Centre, the fight against child labour, and the contribution of the Bureau for Workers' Activities led by Mr. John Svenningsen and his dedicated team. We also appreciate the close cooperation of the ILO Asian Regional Office and the ILO office in Islamabad, and Mr. Nakamura, Assistant Director-General and Mr. Dudley in the Islamabad area office in the promotion of workers' activities.

On this occasion we also look forward to strengthening close cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations, in particularly the World Summit for Social Development in order to promote the ILO ideals of human and trade union rights and tripartism. We also urge member States to ratify the amendment to the ILO Constitution with regard to democratizing its structure in line with the conclusions arrived at after many years of deliberation.

The working class fully supports the right of the independence of the people of Palestine in the occupied Arab lands and welcomes the Report of the Director-General on this matter. We also look forward to the early dismantling of the racist regime of South Africa, and an end to the crime of apartheid which is a crime against mankind, and hope that the just struggle for independence will be crowned with success as soon as possible.

We are sure that this historic session of the Conference will be a milestone for the working man and woman in terms of improving their living and working conditions, enhancing the dignity of work and promotion of social justice and participatory political, economic and social democracy in order to develop a better future for mankind as a whole.

Mr. WITBOOI (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Namibia) – Thank you for having given me this opportunity to address the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Furthermore allow me to join other distinguished speakers who preceded me in warmly congratulating the President on his unanimous election and elevation to this high office. I have no doubt concerning his ability and competence to steer the deliberations and the work of our Conference to a successful conclusion.

My delegation has carefully studied the Report of the Director-General and we are gratified by its quality and comprehensiveness, which demonstrate once again his indefatigability and commitment to the noble goals and ideals of the ILO in its struggle for the promotion of social justice, peace, freedom and the improvement of the social welfare and working conditions of our people. In the light of this, I sincerely congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his re-appointment to this important and high office of the ILO Director-Generalship.

The Report before us contains and highlights a range of tasks which the Organization has set itself during the course of the year. It is indeed a realistic Report and suffice it to say my delegation is in agreement that the ILO should forge ahead to upgrade its work and identify priorities for activities necessitated by the difficulties the world is facing as a result of economic recession, rising unemployment and other related social problems in our respective countries today. Owing to the prevailing stagnation in my country, the Republic of Namibia, formal wage employment can no longer absorb new entrants to the labour market. There is consequently a need to tap the informal sector as a possible alternative way of providing jobs in the future. However, one must recognize the fact that in Namibia very little is known about this sector, and therefore studies must be carried out to identify and determine all the forces at work before any conclusions are drawn.

It is therefore opportune to mention, in the context of ILO technical assistance to Namibia in the fields of vocational training, labour administration, labour market information systems, social security legislation, etc., that significant progress is being made. We greatly appreciate the technical and financial assistance so far provided, and we are grateful to the International Labour Organization and Office and the ILO constituencies the world over for their generous support.

However, we are still experiencing difficulties in the execution and implementation of the projects and programmes owing to lack of capacities, lopsided policies and other shortcomings which are in turn attributable to a lack of proper information.

Despite these difficulties, formidable achievements and progress have been recorded and the Government reaffirms its political will and commitment to achieving full implementation of these programmes. I believe many of you know that we in Namibia have inherited a system which will take a long time to reorganize and put in order. Under these circumstances, we appeal to you for patience and understanding in continuing your all-round support and assistance to the majority of our disadvantaged people. Against this background, we understand and sympathize with the wish of the ILO to reduce costs in certain areas because of lack of financial resources. In the prioritization of the Organization's activities, it is of paramount importance that assistance to the most disadvantaged countries of the developing world must be continued.

Of course, it will be necessary to rationalize accordingly to ensure that help is given to needy countries and peoples to alleviate the high rate of unemployment, extreme poverty and starvation.

In the field of social security, we are busy designing a social security scheme to benefit all the Namibian populace without discrimination. We hope to be able to say one day in this Assembly that we have joined the world of civilized nations by providing these cherished and long awaited social security benefits, particularly maternity, sickness leave and death benefits. Admittedly, this is a very problematic area, in view of the scarcity of material resources of our young African nation.

I must also say that Namibia has inherited a huge public service from the colonial administration. In order to economize in the use of our meagre national resources, we have already embarked on what we call a process of rationalization. The main purpose of this is to reduce costs and increase productivity, efficiency and effectiveness in our public service. In so doing, we are sensitive to the social dimension of this exercise. Everything is being done to help the employees affected find other sources of income by providing training and retraining, and by establishing a fund for this purpose.

I am sure our social partners – the workers' representatives – are making copious notes on what I am saying now. However, our Government is prepared to follow all the procedures laid down by our labour law to make sure we do not deliberately swell the ranks of the unemployed in Namibia.

I believe that if we combine efforts and pool our resources in all the areas of our common interest, we shall certainly be in a good position to make our noble organization effective in carrying out its tasks and responsibilities for the cause of peace, freedom and social justice.

Long live peace and solidarity amongst the nations of the world.

Fourth sitting

Thursday, 3 June 1993, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Badey

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original English: Mr. PETROWSKI (representative of the United Nations) – It is a great pleasure and honour for me as Director-General of the United Nations Office in Geneva to address this distinguished Assembly and to convey the good wishes of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, for the success of your work. I should like also to congratulate warmly Mr. Badey on his election as Vice-President of the 80th Session of the Conference, and to extend publicly my most sincere congratulations to Michel Hansenne for his re-election which entrusts him with the formidable task of leading the ILO into the twenty-first century.

Today, as we come closer to the turn of the century, we are facing fundamental political changes in Central and Eastern Europe and in other parts of the world. The end of ideological hostilities between East and West has given rise to hope and a return to shared values based on principles of democracy, respect for human rights and market economy. We should, however, remain objective and realistic and determine the real difficulties of a political, economic and social nature which will have to be addressed to restore stability and conditions for peace and development. The building up of peace, democracy and the free market economic system is a long and hard process. The threat of increased armed conflicts, local as well as regional, is arriving throughout the world. To provide policy options, it is very important for the international community to grasp fully the root causes of the emerging violence leading to civil wars and internal conflicts. Civil conflicts undermine the democratic process, social peace and stability, and provoke tragic bloodshed and atrocities. The collective efforts of the United Nations, the ILO and other organizations within the United Nations system to address these problems in a comprehensive manner are needed, and our actions must be guided by a clear vision of the needs and requirements of the future.

It is now possible, with the end of the Cold War and the new political environment marked by cooperation rather than confrontation, to take concrete action within the Security Council with respect to the threats to peace, breaches of peace and acts of aggression. The collection of ideas put forward by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his "Agenda for Peace" is a turning point in the United Nations activities to tackle the new challenges for peace. Peace promotion today is, quantity- and quality-wise, different from the past. The Secretary-General of the United Nations pointed out recently that it is even chronologically different. Peace requires "preventive diplomacy, peace-keeping, peace-making and post-conflict peace-building". The cycle continues through perpetual rounds. Increasingly, we can see that working for peace provides us with no place to rest. The promotion of peace must take place before, during and after conflicts.

The "Agenda for Peace", as Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali said, is not only a political matter. The social stability needed for productive growth is nurtured by conditions in which people can readily express their will. Promoting strong domestic institutions of participation means promoting the empowerment of the unorganized, the poor, the marginalized.

Indeed, social justice is not a luxury nor, as Mr. Hansenne has said, a band-aid for the poor. On the eve of its 75th anniversary, the ILO must be given credit for being the pioneer of social promotion and standard-setting activities.

The convening of the World Summit for Social Development will take place in the same year as the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. It will provide opportunities to put the needs of people at the centre of development and international cooperation. Elaborating further on the issue relating to the "Agenda for Development", the Secretary-General of the United Nations has said that although development cannot guarantee peace, without a new and workable concept of development, the United Nations will face an endless sequence of conflicts of the sort we are confronting at this moment.

Just as the words "peace promotion" must be reactivated, so too must the word "development". In its traditional sense, development has failed to transform both poor countries and those in post-conflict situations. It appears that sustainable development is central to development's new definition, but achieving a new approach may well be the most difficult intellectual task of our time.

In referring to the debate that took place here last year on "Democratization and the ILO", I cannot but agree with Mr. Michel Hansenne's conclusion that "the law of the market on its own cannot solve the problems of society... While... the market is much more flexible and efficient in the use of resources and in the management of enterprises than would be a central bureaucracy, it would be contrary to all the principles and all the achievements of the ILO to advocate returning to what some might call 'wild capitalism'". The withdrawal of the State from certain functions could in no way mean its rejection of any responsibility for economic and social policies nor the promotion of social justice.

The ILO is one of the most important organizations within the United Nations system, and has been requested to contribute fully to the preparation of the World Summit for Social Development. Taking into account the ILO's specific role and its tripartite structure, it has a unique responsibility in this field of activity, in particular as regards the enhancement of social integration, the alleviation and reduction of poverty, and the expansion of productive employment. In carrying out these objectives and others, such as progress towards fuller democracy and the improvement of working conditions put forward in its programme of activities for 1994-95, the ILO has to ensure that economic reforms and, in particular, the transition to a market economy, are designed with a view to promoting human rights standards.

The ILO has been and will continue to be the driving force behind social changes and democratic reforms at the national level. A tribute is due to the supporting role played by the ILO in the strengthening of cooperation within the United Nations system, in providing assistance to those looking to us for help in the face of the violation of their fundamental rights. I will only mention as an example the setting up of our joint project on the elimination of child labour that will facilitate and promote the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted in November 1989.

In the coming days, the international community, at the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna, will be conducting a review of relations between human rights, development and democracy. Twenty-five years after the International Conference on Human Rights, held in Teheran, a unique occasion is thus offered in an exceptional context to take stock of our planet's current situation in terms of rights and fundamental freedoms. In this connection, the World Conference on Human Rights is expected to make a number of recommendations which will take into account the major input and proposals put forward by the ILO, in particular on the relationship between human rights, development and democracy.

At a time when the world comes to grips with the economic consequences of the end of the Cold War, it is extremely important to increase cooperation within the organizations of the United Nations family, to set up increased partnership for development. A new vision for development is gradually emerging whose ultimate goal is the improvement of the human condition. A new multilateralism is also being defined. We must confess that the emerging Pax Multilateral or Pax United Nations is deep-rooted in the past history of the ILO. Further progress in this direction still depends to a very large extent upon the achievements of the ILO and our common endeavours.

Before concluding, let me once again express my best wishes for the success of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. POPOVIC (Employers' delegate, Czech Republic) – On behalf of the Czech Employers' delegation, I have the honour to congratulate the President on his election. At the same time, I congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

Since this is the first time I have had the opportunity to speak on behalf of the employers of the Czech Republic, I shall speak briefly on the environment in which we operate. In Bohemia and Moravia, the industrial revolution started in the second decade of the nineteenth century. In Prague in 1933 the Union for the Promotion of Industrial Activities came into existence. Soon after the foundation of the Czechoslovak Republic in 1918, the Central Confederation of Czech Industrialists was established as a nationwide voluntary organization associating industrialists of all nationalities. Gradually, this Confederation, together with major banks, came to control the Czechoslovak economy and played a major role. It joined the International Organization of Employers and was actively involved in its social and employment policies. One of the IOE presidents of that time was born in Brno, an industrial centre in the region of Moravia. In 1950, however, under the communist regime, the employers' confederation ceased to exist.

November 1989 started a new era in the history of Czechoslovakia. The country resumed the path of a free society and a market-oriented economy. The velvet revolution also provided us with an opportunity to renew, after more than 40 years, the activities of the confederation, linking them to those of its predecessor and starting the hard work of restoring the status of Czech industry and advancing it to its prewar level. The non-governmental Confederation of Industry of the Czech Republic was re-established on 5 May 1990. Its initial membership of 153 enterprises has now risen to more than 700, with more than 1 million employees, grouped into 17 branch federations. The Confederation's mission consists of defending its members' interests in the spheres of economic and employment policies, legislation and legal matters, as well as international relations. The main goal of our Confederation for the period to come is to assist in creating productive employment and to play a significant role in the process of the gradual transformation of the economy, its privatization and the creation of market relations, and to contribute towards the development of a pro- market environment with sufficient scope for entrepreneurial activities, and to industrial and social development.

When assessing the results of economic reform, the following achievements can be described as positive: the central planning system was abandoned; steps were taken to achieve currency stability; a large-scale privatization project was launched; and extensive price liberalization took place. State enterprises were granted more independence and most are no longer dependent on state subsidies. Moreover, the state monopoly of foreign trade has been abolished. Foreign investment is welcomed and promoted. The largest investment comes from the United States, Germany, France, Austria and Belgium. The majority of foreign investments have been directed towards traditional industries, such as glass, food, chemicals, and the manufacture of transport equipment.

The Czech Republic was admitted to the International Monetary Fund. Czech industry makes a great effort to market its products on the world market. Here, substantial problems have been encountered in the existing protectionist measures taken by the EC Secretariat in relation to the Central and East European countries. Closer cooperation between representatives of the Czech Government on the one hand and the representatives of the EC Secretariat on the other is called for to solve the existing problems to the full satisfaction of all concerned.

You may agree that basic economic reform by itself cannot solve the problems of society. The great complexity of the problems of the current situation calls for the development of new systems of active labour market policy and social security. Some steps have already been taken, regional labour offices have been established, the basic system of health and social insurance has been adopted. Nevertheless, there is still a lot to be done in the field of pension schemes and protection against various social contingencies. In this respect I have studied the Report of the Director-General very carefully. The fact that the need for an improved mechanism for social protection has increased while the resources for providing it have diminished is undeniable, and this applies not only to the Czech Republic but also to other ILO constituents.

We firmly believe that government policy measures designed to open up the economy, thus improving its competitiveness and cooperation between the social partners, could be the way to generate employment as a main tool of economic, and therefore social, progress.

There is extensive room for taking advantage of the experience acquired by the ILO and the IOE during their years of existence. Their body of knowledge and experience is unique and we are prepared to take advantage of it.

I must, with gratitude, confirm the active support of the International Labour Office representatives to the Czech employers. Recently a delegation from the Bureau for Employers' Activities visited Prague and we discussed the details of future projects to assist us to build up the employers' structures in the Czech Republic, thus allowing us to set up a sound basis for the sustainable development of the country.

I wish all success to this important international assembly. Allow me to assure all of you present here, the representatives and bodies of the International Labour Organization and our colleagues from all over the world, that the Czech employers share the basic principles on which the Organization has been founded and we hope that, in our own capacity, we can contribute to achieving its aims – social progress, freedom of association and the development of productive employment.

Original Russian: Mr. KLOCHKOV (Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election to this honorary post. I wish him the very best of success in the conduct of our business.

The items on our agenda are very topical for the overwhelming majority of countries. The Report submitted by the Director-General of the International Labour Office is especially timely.

The evolution of social protection and social insurance is in our country now the subject of lively debate at labour collectives, in trade unions, in the Government and in Parliament.

The revision of the previously existing social insurance and social protection system in view of the transition period is often the subject of political jousting and manipulation.

In this connection the Report submitted by the Director-General concerning insurance systems currently operating in various countries and which presents various possible strategies is of very practical interest to us.

Indeed, given its importance, a social security system for a given country cannot be established without taking into account the level of economic, political and social development of that country. I agree wholeheartedly with the idea expressed in the Report that it is not always right to go ahead with an automatic transfer of the modern management and administrative structures of developed countries, even if they are highly effective, to other countries.

We believe that a long-term ILO policy could be developed in this area, taking into account the very specific conditions prevailing in the member countries.

For the countries now undergoing a transition from the planned economy to the market economy, one of the most urgent problems is to provide a minimum income and determine the best rapport between rising consumer prices, pay and pensions, as well as to index social assistance. Social protection issues are closely linked to demographics, including the family structure and trends in migration. In Russia, the economic crisis has brought about some very serious problems in the social sphere. The nation's health is deteriorating, the population is ageing more rapidly, there has been an increase in migration and in the number of refugees and the threat of mass bankruptcy is seriously threatening employment.

All this, of course, increases very considerably the burden on the social security system, at the very time when contributions are falling sharply. The employment situation is one of the main factors in this regard.

Unemployment as a social phenomenon has a very special meaning in Russia's circumstances. We must bear in mind that in our country there is a way of thinking conditioned over a period of decades, and that the population has not adapted at all to the new circumstances.

Massive unemployment involving millions of people in particular in remote regions where people very often have nowhere to go if they are laid off, could indeed become a social trigger for a very considerable force.

That is why our trade union association believes unemployment is the most acute problem at the present stage of our reforms. We are in favour of setting threshold limits for unemployment, developing effective jobs programmes and introducing state sponsorship of bankrupt enterprises.

The organization of medical insurance, pension benefits, social allowances, and maintaining social structures for children's vacation homes, workers' health and prevention of occupational diseases requires a more flexible approach. Especially now, as we are laying the basis for a market economy, we need to create mechanisms for social protection to provide the less privileged strata of the population with access to education, health care and social assistance.

We are convinced that during the transitional period it will be extremely important to create a multistage social protection structure with, however, a dominating role to be played by state social insurance.

We object, however, to any attempt, be it by the Government or the Parliament, to exclude trade unions from participating in the management of social insurance funds. We believe that the best solution here would be the principle of a tripartite approach. A draft law to that effect has been preprared by our trade unions and has been submitted to Parliament.

We are aware of the practical influence of the ILO in this regard. This influence stems not only from the very practical significance of adopted Conventions, ILO seminars and conferences, but also from the spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding which is shown by representatives of governments, employers and trade unions in the course of their joint work.

We would like to express our satisfaction with the ILO's Budapest mission and the cooperation we have had with it. Its experts helped in the preparation of a seminar in Moscow for Russian trade unions, in spring of this year.

We trust the ILO will in future pay still more attention to the problems experienced by countries embarking on the road of a market economy, fostering observance of ILO Conventions and Recommendations not only by the employers and the workers, but also by the governments of these countries. It is our common duty to ensure that such values are upheld and to endeavour to solve social problems by peaceful means. We also believe it is our duty to maintain the standards of social guarantees which are enshrined in these Conventions and Recommendations.

We are in favour of cooperation on an equal footing with the Government and employers. We want to have a joint search for mutually acceptable solutions in all spheres of social and labour relations. The trade unions showed this readiness and good will by signing the general agreement for 1993, despite some dissension. I can note with satisfaction that the Government of Russia is beginning to realise that it cannot successfully carry out the reforms without the cooperation of the employers and the trade unions. I am convinced that the ILO will support our efforts, which are aimed at overcoming the restriction and diktat which characterized relations with trade unions in the past and from time to time manifests itself in certain circles to this day.

Our federation greatly appreciates the ILO's position concerning the defence of freedom of association. Any violation of trade union rights and freedoms in any country must be met with an appropriate response from the ILO and a show of overall solidarity by the entire trade union movement. The Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Russia is naturally an ally of all forces of reform in the country which are genuinely in favour of democracy and want to strike a balance between the economic interests of all the main strata of society.

For most workers, the transition will inevitably bring some misfortune and hardship. But this need not – and must not – be without limits. The price must stay reasonable. The trade unions wish to abide by their basic fundamental principle to ensure social justice and keep civil peace in our country.

There simply is no aim which can justify employing any means and can warrant hurting so many people. And there can be no ready-made solution or universal panacea for all countries. There must be scrupulous consideration of national particularities and the real condition of the economy, the social consequences of past political and economic decisions and, finally, a good deal of common sense. These must become the mainstay of reform. We need to have a proportional distribution of the burden of the economic crisis between labour, capital and the State. This is the main task which we now must tackle.

Only thus, will we be able to see to it that the interests of Russia will organically include the interests of its workers, its employers, and its Government, while excluding no one.

This is indeed a guarantee for a peaceful process of reform in Russia. We are convinced that the International Labour Organization will lend its support in our noble endeavour.

Original Russian: Mr. BEISENOV (Minister of Labour, Kazakhstan) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to this important and honourable post. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office and wish him every success in his work.

It is indeed a great honour for my country, Kazakhstan, to be a fully-fledged Member of the ILO and to participate in the work of this session of the Conference. On 1 June 1993 we had the honour, on behalf of the Government of Kazakhstan, to send an official letter to the Director-General, of the International Labour Office, Mr. Hansenne, informing him of Kazakhstan's full membership of this authoritative international organization.

We are aware of and appreciate the importance and responsibility of this role, and we shall endeavour to become a worthy Member of the ILO. Therefore we would ask the leadership of the ILO and its committees to involve us in all activities, so that we can acquire experience and knowledge of basic ILO activities and aims.

We also call upon our colleagues and the ministers of labour to share their experience with us and provide assistance.

If I may, I would like to say a few words about Kazakhstan. It is a new and large independent country. More than 100 countries have recognized its independence. During the two years it has enjoyed sovereignty and independence, it has become a fully-fledged member of the United Nations, has joined many international financial, economic and social associations and established diplomatic relations with more than 20 countries.

The President of the Republic of Kazakhstan, Mr. Nursultan Nazarbaev, and the Government are now actively working to ensure that Kazakhstan becomes an economically developed, democratic and modern State as quickly as possible. We have every chance of succeeding in this. You know, of course, that Kazakhstan is not only an agricultural republic, it is also relatively industrialized. Industry includes machine building, chemicals, ferrous and non-ferrous metallurgy, coal mining, oil and gas.

Of course, this vast potential needs to work for the benefit of the human being, to satisfy his daily needs and concerns. In this connection, we are currently undergoing a transition to a market economy and experiencing all its positive and negative effects. Measures are being taken to privatize state property and we are evolving new methods and forms of management for economic and social processes. We are also building new markets for the means of production, securities, and a housing market. Of course, we also are creating a labour market. We already have some unemployment. Growth always brings with it problems of employment, training, retraining for the unemployed, labour protection and migration. However, so far, we have very little experience or methods of work. We are short of experts to deal with problems relating to employment, labour protection, training skilled workers, social development and technology, and we are sadly lacking in up-to-date methodology. Kazakhstan is a young State in Central Asia and is hoping for technical assistance from the ILO to resolve these problems.

We have examined the ILO's programme and budget proposals for 1994-95, and we believe there should be a special reference to the provision of technical assistance to the new Central Asian States, such as Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

Of course, we in Kazakhstan and the other Central Asian Republics are very interested in the idea of social partnership, labour management and technical cooperation. The reports and statements read yesterday and today contain many helpful ideas. We have received a lot of information and pamphlets from the ILO. All this is extremely useful. However, I would like to put forward a proposal – perhaps you could open a small ILO office in our region sometime in the future which would be a great help for the five new Central Asian Republics, which have a population of more than 60 million people. A possible location would be Alma Ata.

The ILO's important role is known throughout the world. Its authority is growing day by day in terms of its activities and contact with other countries. The Government of Kazakhstan would like to express its gratitude to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the very successful work carried out by ILO experts at seminars and other training courses and in particular the work done by Messrs. Maier, de Vries Reilingh and Duiker and other experts. Very recently, the ILO held a successful conference in Ankara and, in cooperation with the Government and Ministry of Labour of Turkey, we discussed all problems concerning social partnership, employment, labour protection and social protection for the population. Kazakhstan is participating and keen to continue participating in all other ILO activities and is trying to support all activities which may be of use to it.

Kazakhstan is a major Republic and together with the other Republics is a very specific and new region for the ILO to deal with as I have mentioned before. I would therefore suggest that it would be extremely useful for us if the International Labour Office were to include representatives of Kazakhstan and other Central Asian Republics among its permanent staff in Geneva. This would also be of major use to the ILO and it is bound to have a very great effect on our involvement in ILO activities and on a practical level with the new Central Asian Republics.

There is yet another phenomenon which I am duty bound to mention – namely issues surrounding migration and population displacement. In this connection, we would like to appeal to you and to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. Since independence, many of our citizens would like to return to the fatherland they were once forced to leave. I would like, through the ILO and its leadership, to appeal to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees to provide material assistance in this matter, as our new Republic cannot afford to do so.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I hope that we shall complete our Conference successfully. We have read very carefully all the documents, and we believe that they are extremely objective and give a true picture of the situation. I would like once again to thank the President of the Conference, the Director-General, and all participants of this session of the Conference. I would like to wish you good health and success in all your endeavours.

Original Spanish: Mr. GIRONDA (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Bolivia) – I should like to present my best wishes to the President and to congratulate him on his election. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General and express the wish that his new term may be as fruitful as the last. May I further welcome all the new member States of the ILO.

I should like to make the following comments on the first part of the Report of the Director-General concerning the evaluation of the social insurance and social protection schemes of member States.

We share the Director-General's concern regarding the causes and consequences of the structural crisis in social security schemes throughout the world and we underscore the need to study substantial reforms in order to adapt them to the present requirements of each country and of the men and women who suffer the adverse impact and traumatic consequences of the crisis.

It is essential that such schemes be modernized, taking into account economic, political and social factors, the distinctive characteristics of individual countries and the global aspects of the problem.

Coverage must also be extended. To that end, the Government of Bolivia has adopted two important measures: it has established a health insurance scheme for professional drivers covering some 250,000 beneficiaries and, under Presidential Decree No. 23462, it has set up an inter-institutional commission to carry out technical studies on the introduction of social security benefits for some 800,000 workers in the informal sector.

It is important to improve benefits and their scope, which have greatly deteriorated in recent years.

A further basic prerequisite for the development of social security schemes is the modernization of institutions and of the administration of services, making them less bureaucratic and more technically oriented.

Schemes must also be adapted to the circumstances prevailing in each country. However, it is essential that the users, that is to say the workers, assume responsibility for the administration of such services through technical and administrative machinery.

The State must also play its part through more effective and appropriate controls, allowing users to choose freely whatever scheme best suits their needs. Recognizing individual men and women as the core element of society, the architects of development and decision-makers in their own right implies protecting them from totalitarian interventionism and enhancing the status of the individual who has such an enormous contribution to make to society. The traditional relationship must be reversed: first the human condition and then the political system. It is essential that individuals be left to seek and choose their own destiny because attempts to turn societies into pieces of clockwork deprived of freedom of choice impede the economic and cultural development of peoples.

In the case of social protection schemes, we must explore in greater depth and develop still further the criteria and activities whereby all problems relating to the better protection of social rights may be addressed. In this connection, the Government of President Zamora of Bolivia has succeeded through its policies in making Bolivia's inflation rate the lowest in the continent. Its economy has grown at a rate of 3.5 per cent up to 1992 and a growth of 4 per cent is forecast for the current year. The share of the private sector in economic activity, especially in the export sector, is greater than that of the public sector. The State no longer concerns itself with setting up enterprises but rather with investing in human capital, society's most important productive force – investing more in education, health, housing, infrastructure and the creation of a healthy environment. There has been a marked decline in the child mortality and illiteracy ratios and a considerable increase in foreign reserves and domestic savings. Lastly, we have had a stable economy for the past eight years. Moreover, for ten years our country has been a democracy and may be viewed as a shining example of political development.

With regard to the second part of the Report of the Director-General, we warmly welcome all the action taken by the International Labour Organization to secure compliance with international standards and respect for human rights. We are aware of the importance of these two dimensions of modern society. We are living in the era of human rights and Bolivia has therefore joined the international community in establishing a joint line of action for human rights throughout the world and in our own country.

President Zamora has worked and continues to work towards implementing his proposal regarding the operation of the international fund for the development of indigenous peoples – a policy designed to afford social protection to millions of men and women of our continent.

It should also be noted that the Government of Bolivia strictly complies with international standards designed to prevent discrimination in employment. At the same time, it is pursuing policies designed to generate more and better jobs by setting up special mechanisms for the purpose.

In spite of the low prices for tin in the international market and the crisis in the mining industry, major steps have been taken to protect the mining sector as a source of income for the country and of employment for the workers. It is hoped that risk-sharing contracts with foreign capital will attract more substantial investment with a view to solving economic, technological and social problems.

With regard to freedom of association, the Government of President Zamora has been second to none in complying to the letter with standards of freedom of association and trade union activity. Decree No. 22407 contains an entire section endorsing and guaranteeing trade union rights and for the first time recognizing the status of trade union leaders.

With regard to labour inspection, we have increased the number of inspectors, who are subject to strict control in terms of qualifications and efficiency.

The Government of Bolivia has, after 51 years, prepared a draft General Labour Law, drawing on the advisory services of ILO experts. On completion, the draft was submitted to the employers' and employees' organizations, which have not yet reacted officially to the text although they have taken note of its content.

Retraining facilities were provided for 16,000 workers during the period 1989 to 1992. It is proposed to train a further 16,000 workers to join the labour market in 1993. A major boost has thus been given to the training of human resources.

Two practical measures were adopted with a view to generating collective awareness of health and safety in the workplace and protection of the work environment: implementation of the national workers' health plan and the national campaign for health and safety in the workplace. President Zamora endorsed these activities in a presidential statement in which he urged his ministers and employers' and employees' organizations to play their part in ensuring health and safety in the workplace.

Problems relating to children, women and the family have been addressed in a highly responsible way by ONAMFA, a body run by Mrs. Rosario Paz Zamora, who has devoted considerable attention to these important issues.

Another major component of government action has been the urgently needed modernization of labour relations, whose most effective tool is dialogue. Five decades of confrontation and conflict have taken their toll of the economic and social forces involved. Hence the crucial need for consultations and dialogue.

In fulfilling the new tasks of the ILO and its member States, it is important to take into account the new means of creating and producing wealth which are appearing throughout the world: the new cultures of freedom and democracy to which virtually all countries of the world have adhered, the changes in political systems, the breakdown of dominant ideologies, the impressive social movements which are causing upheaval amongst nations, the dislocation of geographical maps which until yesterday had seemed immovable, the destruction of apparently stable value systems. All these make us think that international organizations must also change in order to better adapt to new realities and satisfy the requirements of their member States. Not only are standards required. We must understand one another's specificity, existing problems and the changes undergone. The ILO has put its stamp on international legislation in the labour field but the significant changes in the world are leaving the ILO behind. The ILO should be able to anticipate events and regulate labour relations; but today it is the events which are driving the machinery of the International Labour Organization. That is why we must emphasize that the ILO must tune itself to the changing economic and political world. The ILO must be modernized and democratized in order to make it more effective and to satisfy the requirements of the nations which form it.

The present day world has brought with it many changes whose strength has shattered myths and paradigms, paralysed movement, reanimated struggles and generated confusion and despair. To determine the urgent measures needed to overcome the traumas of the world of work, I have the following proposals to make: (1) We must renew the spirit of entrepreneurship in order to create a new generation of entrepreneurs who are prepared to play their role in the new international economy. (2) We must implant social democracy in the workplace in order to develop economic relations and give impetus to productive changes. (3) We must promote a new culture of production, work and investment. (4) We must establish consultation as a principal for harmony and social consensus in order to remove conflict from labour relations. (5) We must redefine the role of the State in labour relations. (6) We must reform the vision, the conduct and the action of trade union organizations. (7) We must give more value to human labour, as a recognition of the dignity of man. (8) We must accelerate the acquisition of skills and training in order to assimilate new technologies. (9) We must develop initiative and creativity and prepare for the future. (10) We must preserve the safety and health of the workers and their working environment. (11) We must fight for an open society which will make of man the protagonist of freedom and democracy.

Original French: Mr. KAMOUGUE (Minister of the Public Service and Labour, Chad) – My country, Chad, belongs to the group of nations which the international community calls the poorest countries, the least advanced, or the fourth world. Its plight is due to a series of internal crises, characterized by the stifling of freedom, political instability, and an infernal cycle of violence, which has led to the total dismantling of the State.

These various events have been compounded by foreign interventions in the context of border disputes and fraticidal civil wars, which have not only prevented the emergence of democracy and the rule of law, but have also undermined national cohesion and dashed the chances of social and economic development, and hence, of a social security system.

The Sovereign National Conference of Chad, which opened on 15 February 1993 in N'Djamena, has carefully examined the political, economic, social and cultural situation of our country in the past 30 years in order to identify the ills afflicting the Chadian people and devise a suitable shock therapy.

I am honoured, at the end of this historical event, to be the first Chadian minister to take the floor before this august assembly, the International Labour Conference, and to proclaim our solidarity with the ILO and transmit this message of peace and hope on behalf of our people.

Before I continue, allow me to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to guide the discussions of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. His personal, human and intellectual qualities, together with his long experience of social questions, were certainly determining factors in the choice of the delegates. We are assured already that his dynamism will give impetus to our debate, and that his farsightedness will help the developing countries to overcome their problems and to achieve an acceptable level of social development at the end of this millennium.

The need for security is as old as the world. Many kinds of systems have been put into place so far, but they have not yet come close to providing suitable protection to all members of each society. These systems range from "group institutions" (the family, the village, the clan, the tribe), to modern contributory systems of social security, including various other systems such as individual savings schemes, mutual benefit societies, provident funds, etc.

The present level of contributory social security schemes varies from one country to another because these schemes do not often generate wealth but are simply used to redistribute income. Therefore it is clear that their evolution is linked to the economic development of each country, a fact which led J. J. Duperoux to say: "tell me what the level of development of your social security system is and I will tell you what the level of development of your country is".

As I have said, my country is one of the poorest countries. The series of crises it has experienced has endangered national solidarity and lowered the chances of social and economic development, and therefore of better social security.

In fact, the Chadian system of social security, which is confined to modern sector workers, only covers two major risks – family allowances and occupational accidents and diseases. Old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions, created in 1978, only became operational in 1983. Thus, only three types of risks are covered by our social security system.

A draft social security code has been prepared by the Government with the ILO's valuable assistance, since 1987 but, because of a lack of funds, we have not been able to have the text examined by the social partners and it therefore remains in draft form. This is also true for the revised Labour Code which still languishes with the administration.

I am sure you will agree that social security in Chad could be better; indeed we place our hope in the transitional government installed by the Sovereign National Conference, and charged with implementing a programme of action which includes the following social aspects: the annulment of dismissals and forced retirements; the regular pay of salaries and pensions to civilian and military personnel, including the payment of back wages which amount to about six months, on average, for a total of 10,000 million CFA francs, or 200 million French francs (negotiations are under way with the major trade unions to ensure social peace); the reintegration into the active life of those who are returning from exile; and lastly, provisions banning the Government from borrowing from the National Social Security Fund, and requiring it to repay outstanding loans.

The "autopsy" which was undertaken by the 800 delegates at the Sovereign National Conference did not spare anyone. The Chadian State, under the various governments which have succeeded one another since the Popular Salvation Movement came to power in 1990, has been led to bankruptcy. The shock therapy to be administered will spare no one. Sacrifices will be unavoidable. All, without exception, whether employers, workers in the public and private sectors, those who govern and those who are governed – none will be spared the obligatory measures for economic recovery. It is through peace, dialogue and transparency in the management of public affairs and trust that this recovery will come about. The transitional government set up on 11 April is asking the social partners, national and foreign, to take part in this great effort. The Chadian people alone cannot succeed, and they launch an appeal to the international community to help us as it has done in the past. On behalf of my Government, I thank you in advance, and assure you of our commitment.

The underdevelopment or lack of development of some member States of our Organization is often structural in nature. The models which we inherited from the colonial era reflected a certain political philosophy of domination and subservience. Unfortunately, our first governors were not able to adapt them to the new context. Since the late 1980s the concept of multiparty democracy has come into fashion, and is touted as a panacea which can cure all the ills affecting our countries, in spite of the worldwide economic crisis and the constant fall in the price of commodities.

Chad is now undertaking a process which has been fully discussed and jointly decided by the representatives of the different social groups in our country. Each element of our mandate is a major challenge to our people. On our success depend future generations. Chad has shown that it could make war. Now it must show that it can also make peace and ensure the well-being of its people. The implementation of the decisions of our National Conference will require major sacrifices. In particular it requires coherence between our social expectations and our budgetary constraints, which we hope to achieve through a social pact to be negotiated with the social partners. Social peace through a social pact, political stability, and the commitment of the international community in supporting our national effort are the keys to our success.

Mr. ZHARIKOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President and all members of the bureau who have been elected to lead this historical session.

The Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, is to be congratulated on the selection and comprehensive coverage of current problems in the field of social insurance and protection, and on the important proposals he has made for national and international action to deal with some of those problems.

With the development of civilization, humanity differentiated itself increasingly from the lower animals whose only law is that the strong eat the weak in order to survive and continue.

However, while drawing on the lessons of history, we should never forget the decisive role played by organized workers, by their trade unions, in the emergence and development of social security as a public policy. Nor should we forget that the great social revolutions in the early part of this century played a very decisive role in this field and indeed led to the creation of the ILO in 1919.

By this we are not trying to claim all the credit for the trade union movement and its allies, but we do wish to draw attention to the fact that only through the encouragement of organized labour and its concerted actions to uphold workers' rights and social demands can steady progress be made in implementing the decisions taken by us here at this Conference with the aim of developing and extending the coverage of social security schemes.

What is also missing from the Report is the role of so-called "anti-social policies" in the recent deterioration of social security systems both in the developed and developing countries. The adjustment measures recommended by the International Monetary Fund as a universal remedy resulted in drastic cuts in allocations for social security measures. Although it is accepted that the success of economic reforms requires an effective social safety net what is being done in practice seriously undermines the existing social protection schemes, and this is to be deplored.

The World Federation of Trade Unions at the fifth world trade union congress in 1962 adopted the Social Security Charter and updated it at the tenth world trade union congress in 1982. The trade union strategy for the 1990s elaborated by the twelfth world trade union congress in 1990 developed this policy, underlining the fact that social security is the fundamental task of all trade union organizations.

We think it is also necessary to examine how the current drive towards privatization affects the future of social insurance and social protection. The economic and social cost of the scorched-earth methods practised in the eastern part of Germany, the so-called "shock therapy" which is now en vogue in several countries, as well as the widely practised policy of privatization need to be comprehensively assessed, since all of these are of great relevance to our present discussion. We feel that the command method, which failed in the formerly centrally planned economies, should not reappear in the guise of a command method of privatization.

The existing tendency is also to transfer the State's responsibility in the field of social protection to the private sector and to the individuals concerned, in order to achieve the desired cuts in the state budget.

It is said that the current global recession is the worst since the crisis of the 1930s. The major lesson of the 1930s was that an adequate social safety system should be built into a modern state structure, since market structures are extremely vulnerable in times of recession and crisis. For this, active state intervention was considered desirable and essential.

The rampant inflation which accompanies the economic reforms in some countries is gravely undermining social security budgets and funds.

One of the greatest challenges currently facing social protection systems is the overall stagnation in the labour market and the constant growth in mass unemployment, which reduce the volume of social security contributions and lead at the same time to demands for increased payments from social security funds.

As well as analysing the correlation between social security protection and employment promotion programmes, it is also necessary to consider social protection in relation to current demographic trends, changes in family structures, and the growth in labour mobility and migration.

We would therefore like to invite the ILO to undertake, as part of its programme of work for the next biennium, the necessary research and make appropriate recommendations in such areas as: problems of social protection in the transition period; the role of social protection in labour market regulation; and relations between social protection institutions and government bodies.

We are living in a period marked by a tremendous desire for greater solidarity, cooperation and emancipation. But what is the situation in the world today?

Contrary to the wishes of peoples, the dominant powers are seeking to assert the interests of big business in matters concerning development, social and humanitarian policies, rights and freedoms, peace and security.

Neoliberal recipes are being applied in developed and developing countries alike, the result being higher unemployment, the excessive use of women workers, child labour, the jeopardizing of social gains, and attacks on freedoms, the right to strike and trade union rights, which have even led to the disappearance and murder of numerous trade union activists. Moreover, purchasing power in the countries of the developing world has continued to decline as a result of the plundering of their resources, the growing inequity of the terms on which they trade, the heavy burden of debt servicing, the limited access to technology and the growing domination of the transnational corporations in their economies.

This situation perpetuates and exacerbates underdevelopment and its tragic consequences: malnutrition, poverty, destitution, illiteracy, the destruction of the natural environment and the spread of disease. In such conditions, the inequalities between dominant and dominated countries are widening, creating a real time bomb. In short, disorder, insecurity and conflict are increasing on every continent and are further aggravated by the militarization of economies, arms sales being one manifestation of this. Corruption is the common feature of many of those in power. These among others are the real manifestations of the so-called new world order.

In such conditions it is no exaggeration to say that the demand for a new system of international relations is being hijacked, and, the right to interfere has been substituted for the duty to promote real cooperation. Should this trend not be reversed?

Given such prospects and policies, should we not be engaging in a struggle to take up the challenge and place greater emphasis on satisfying the needs of peoples for equal choices, development, respect for their identity and for their political, economic and cultural independence? And how is this to be done?

For the trade union movement, this constitutes a challenge to its capacities to play its proper role in every country. What is needed is a profound renewal to help us meet today's challenge while respecting our diversity and differences.

For the ILO and all its constituents, it is also a challenge to confront a new world completely different from yesterday's. In this regard, we appreciate the proposals of the ILO to base its policy and activities for 1994-95 on three main priorities: the development of democracy, the fight against poverty, and the extension of social security. In our opinion in this wider view the ILO should also be involved in the preparations for the World Summit for Social Development, to convey the serious and comprehensive message from the labour world that the recent short-sighted policies, which have seen things in terms of one irreversible and linear movement, underestimate the real situation, which is more complex and contradictory. As history shows, the expression of the needs of people and society, has the potential to change completely what seems to be the established order.

It seems that the situation in the social and labour fields is not an ordinary one, and the solutions we seek cannot be ordinary either.

If we regard tripartism as an effective mechanism of labour relations for the future, we have to create equal opportunities for all its elements. The reality is quite different, above all at the national level, where the workers' side – the trade unions – is constantly suppressed and marginalized. This is a dangerous situation.

That is why we have to establish a goal for the ILO to aim at and work out a labour relations formula which will guarantee the existence of trade unions as a strong partner, and we must also create the right conditions for that – political, juridical, material, etc. It is true that trade unions themselves bear a great part of the responsibility of adapting to the situation, but not less responsibility lies on the other side.

This is a high challenge that time has placed before the International Labour Office, its leadership, and all of us. We have to realize that we cannot avoid or evade this challenge. We must confront it.

Original Spanish: Mr. DEL RÍO DOÑE (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – We congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in this difficult task of analysing the Report of the Director-General of the ILO and the items on the agenda of this 80th Session.

The Dominican Republic shares the island of Hispaniola with the Republic of Haiti. It is situated in the central Caribbean, and this is part of the Americas. The Dominican Republic has around 7.5 million inhabitants. During its history it has fought valiantly to achieve its position of dignity amongst free peoples.

In 1844, after many struggles, we achieved independence from Haiti under whose rule we had lived for 22 years and then we achieved independence from Spanish rule, in 1865. Our people also had to bear the burden of United States intervention lasting eight years, from 1916 to 1924, and in 1965 the United States intervened for a second time under the false pretext that our constitutional April revolution was controlled by Marxist groups.

We workers are those who produce the national wealth, especially our women who work in rural areas and in the city. They have always been the protagonists in our hard fought struggles, in the suffering and hopes of our people. Having experienced under one of the bloodiest tyrannies of Latin America under General Trujillo from 1930 to 1961, our people achieved freedom and democracy as a result of great sacrifice. It was only 32 years ago that we were able to overthrow the dictatorship which oppressed us. Although democracy and public freedoms were conquered with great effort, the fight for full trade union freedom continues and it is still a fundamental objective to be achieved along with others, if we are to ensure the full dignity of our workers.

When the dictatorship collapsed in September 1961 we established a United Workers' Front for Autonomous Trade Unions (FOUPSA). This unitarian experience rapidly came to an end under the influence of the Cold War and that of certain political parties, and because there was a lack of awareness amongst our working class. Today the workers have not been able to achieve a lasting trade union unity and this makes us weaker, especially since only 10 per cent of our workers are organized.

As an underdeveloped country where the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have imposed their conditions, which are monetarist, and where governments elected by the people have failed to respect the national commitments which they made, or meet the expectations placed in them by the workers, we still have many problems of a human, economic, social, political and ethical as well as moral kind, the brunt of which must be borne by the large majority. Even after 32 years from the shackles of dictatorship the workers and the people have still not achieved human development, and the same is true of the great majority of countries in Latin America, where only a small group of privileged persons enjoys the wealth which belongs to us all.

There is a glaring lack of social security systems, which could provide workers' families and the whole population with real social services from the time of birth up to the moment of death.

Unemployment is still one of the major scourges for the economically active population despite the establishment of so-called export processing or free zones which in our country employ 140 million people; they are the second largest employer.

This situation and the low wages paid have led to the growth of an informal economy to satisfy the basic needs of thousands of workers who cannot subsist on the wages paid by the State or our factories.

There are also the problems of the concentration of land in few hands, notwithstanding the existence of a set of laws which, if applied, would lead to social justice in agrarian reform. Here I would like to pay tribute to Doña Florinda Muñoz Soriaro (Doña Tingo), a peasant woman and martyr of Christian trade unionism who founded the Classit Trade Union Autonomous Confederation (CASC) and who was murdered by the land owners during the struggles for the right to land ownership.

The inflation in 1990 was 106 per cent. It was reduced to 7 per cent by the end of 1992 – a major achievement – although because of the accumulated inflation from past years, our workers still do not have enough income to allow them to acquire the goods and services which they need to live in dignity as human beings and children of God.

We are now making a demand for a general increase in wages which we hope will help us improve our present situation.

Critical poverty and its adverse consequences are still plaguing us despite the great efforts being made by the active forces of the nation to improve the fate of the Dominican people and of more than a million of our brother workers from Haiti who have come to our country in search of a better life, just like the Dominicans who each year try to cross the Mona Passage in unstable boats to Puerto Rico and from there to the United States (many die during the crossing). Others go to Europe in search of a more human destiny, although many are sent back by the immigration authorities and their hopes are dashed.

The evils besetting our nation cannot be solved under the present conditions imposed by the IMF, the World Bank and the so-called Club of Paris.

Our foreign debt, has already been paid in human terms many times over, and so it is totally unacceptable that we should continue paying it since it deprives us of an important part of our annual budget. In addition, the prices for our agricultural products, sugar cane, coffee, cocoa and others, as well as the prices for our minerals which are imposed upon us by the rich countries create new forms of injustice, imperialism and dependency which, together with the foreign debt, make it impossible for us to achieve the development we so badly need.

We denounce the enforcement of new liberalism with its savage recipe of the free market devoid of any social awareness or human solidarity. It is unethical and immoral to impose it upon us as a solution to our problems. It only compounds the problems of our national production and creates other problems, such as unemployment, and reduces the role of the State to a minimum. And so the rich countries become even more powerful and those of the Third World even less developed. The rich become richer and the poor become more deprived.

Despite all these problems and difficulties, we the organized workers continue our struggles. We have not lost faith and hope. We have understood and are determined to pursue the path of tripartite dialogue in the search for genuine social consensus.

The hierarchy of the Catholic Church has been one of the champions of dialogue with its moral authority. The ILO has also promoted many important tripartite meetings in our country.

Last year we were able to establish a new Labour Code as a result of this dialogue. Despite certain difficulties in its practical application in some sectors, especially as regards trade union freedom and trade union protection (fuero), we are now discussing regulations for its application.

Trade union education continues to be a permanent objective for the achievement of a class consciousness and for people to shoulder their responsibilities in organizational development.

We owe sincere thanks to the ILO for its technical assistance to workers' organizations and for the fact that this assistance is provided in an equal and egalitarian manner in our country.

We have not lost hope and we are convinced as men of faith that we – the Dominican workers – will achieve full trade union freedom and that we will bring about, with the unified support of all the workers, in both rural areas and the cities, an organized movement which will enable us to make tripartite discussion an effective instrument to achieve peace based on social justice.

Mr. BOATENG (Minister of Employment and Social Welfare, Ghana) – I congratulate the President and other officers on their well-deserved election to preside over the deliberations of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is the sincere belief of the Ghanaian delegation that the President will bring to bear on our deliberations the rich and mature experience which he so eloquently exhibited during the last OAU Labour Commission Meeting in Cairo.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election for a second term of office and commend him on the quality of the Conference Reports which he has devoted to the development of the system of social protection in member countries and to the role of the ILO in promoting levels of effectiveness and efficiency in its technical cooperation.

The challenges facing many developing countries, largely as a result of constraints imposed upon their economies by the unjust international economic order, have not only created psychological, social and cultural shocks, but have also created serious social imbalances and unacceptable disparities in the wages and incomes of working people.

In many countries, the problems have assumed critical dimensions despite structural adjustment programmes. Thus the foundations of our social security patterns which we have painstakingly built over the years have been severely affected as many of our countries struggle to meet the basic needs of humanity.

Against this background we have a historic obligation to work towards not only improving the quality of life of our people during their working days, but also to provide security for them during their retirement.

The choice of the theme for this Conference – social insurance and social protection – amply drives home this message.

Building a sustainable social security system calls for new approaches, new strategies and new attitudes on the part of governments, industrialists and working people. In modern societies, it is not possible to initiate and master social change without first understanding the economic background.

It is our sincere expectation that this understanding will emerge from our debate here and generate initiatives to help enrich our respective experiences and types of social security systems.

On attainment of independence, Ghana embarked on an intensive socio-economic and industrial programme aimed at improving the quality of life of the people. This programme, which resulted in rural/urban migration undermined our traditional socio-economic structures and led to insecurity of workers in their old age.

The synthesis of this was the introduction of a provident fund with a national dimension to provide a satisfactory income security for Ghanaian workers, which was to be converted into a pension scheme after five years.

Because the provident fund was not fulfilling the basic essence of social insurance due to various socio-economic factors, the Government of the Provisional National Defence Council established a pension scheme in 1991 to provide a social insurance scheme for all workers in Ghana.

My delegation would like to place on record Ghana's appreciation of the ILO and the International Social Security Association for their invaluable advice, support and assistance in converting the provident funds scheme into the Ghana Social Security Pension Scheme.

The new pension scheme offers monthly pensions during old age, as well as invalidity and lump-sum payments to survivors of deceased members of the scheme. Pension payments range from 50 to 80 per cent of the best three years' salaries with a minimum contribution period of 240 months and payable on reaching the age of 55 and above. The pensions are reviewed periodically and indexed to any wage increases offered to workers in the country.

Another interesting aspect of the new pension scheme is that it offers wider coverage to benefit workers from both the formal and informal sectors of the economy. Workers in the security agencies are, however, exempted from this scheme because of the nature of their work.

To ensure the continued viability of the scheme, which is self-financing, the trust is investing in high-yielding but low-risk ventures. In fact, with the current healthy and competitive economic environment, the trust is investing in treasury bills, government stocks and bonds, equities, and others.

The need to sustain the good health of workers, both in their working period and in their old age, has influenced the trust to finance the building of hospitals and clinics throughout the country to be run by the Ministry of Health.

Again, the trust continues to build workers' flats to help solve the housing problems confronting workers. Furthermore, the scheme is offering loans to students in the tertiary institutions as its modest contribution towards the human resources development of the nation.

Notwithstanding these positive developments, it is important to mention some of the difficulties facing the scheme. These include: (i) mobilizing contributors and keeping accurate records which would be readily accessible to them; (ii) managing the funds well enough to sustain the scheme; (iii) developing prompt and accurate systems of payment of pensions; (iv) galvanizing maximum public support for increased membership and sustaining their interest in the scheme to ensure its successful operation.

The task of making the scheme more responsive and attractive to the socio-economic needs of the contributors and society shall remain the single major responsibility of the trust. In pursuit of this objective, my delegation believes that Ghana can continue to count on the technical support and assistance of all friendly countries and international organizations specialized in social security.

The Director-General, in Part II of his Report, has recounted the several activities of the ILO during the year 1992. Ghana, as usual, benefited from some of the technical assistance programmes. These included support for the development of a labour market information system, the joint ILO/UNDP umbrella programme for sustained employment generation, and the institutional strengthening of my Ministry to respond positively to its task of initiating and managing employment policies. Again, we continued to enjoy the facilities of ARLAC in its training programmes and do hope that this will continue in the years ahead.

On development in South Africa, Ghana would like to reiterate its support for the positions taken by the OAU, the United Nations and the ILO in respect of the total emancipation of, and majority rule for, the peoples of South Africa. The loss of Chris Hani and Oliver Tambo, two illustrious sons of South Africa, should serve as the final pacification for the achievement of national unity in the march towards political and democratic rule.

Ghana therefore appeals to all the factions and racial groups to eschew violence and exercise the greatest restraint in the search for a just, fair and lasting solution to the problem of apartheid.

In conclusion, I wish to convey to this august Conference the warm and fraternal felicitations of the Parliament and Government of the Fourth Republic of Ghana, inaugurated on 7 January 1993. As part of its constitutional and democratic responsibility, our Government and the legislature will study the concerns expressed by the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and enact labour laws that will conform to the provisions of international labour Conventions and Recommendations for the benefit of all our people.

Second report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. The first item on our agenda today is the second report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5A.

Have you any comments or objections to make? If not I shall consider that the report is adopted.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Before giving the floor to the first speaker on my list, I would like, on behalf of the Conference and on behalf of all of us present here, to welcome Bosnia Herzegovina and to congratulate this new State which has just become a member State of the ILO, bringing the number of members to 165.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have pleasure in extending to the President, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of Bahrain, our warmest congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is an admirable token of international confidence in which we take pride, a tribute to the role of the Arab Republic of Egypt in promoting peace and social justice, and an expression of esteem for the President's experience and personal competence, which are a sure guarantee of the success of this Conference. I also offer my warm congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO on his clear and comprehensive report on Social insurance and social protection at the international level.

The Director-General's Report draws attention to the favourable trends in levels of social protection in the developed industrialized countries and to the shortcomings in such schemes in the developing countries. It also presents an overall strategy for providing those countries with the means of developing systems of health care, disability, old-age and death benefits, sickness, unemployment, maternity and family allowances and other types of social security benefit at a pace that enables the developing countries to narrow the gap that separates them from the developed countries with a view to ensuring a minimum income and hence an adequate standard of living for all members of society.

As a contribution to the debate on these questions, I should like to make the following points. First of all, we agree with the Director-General when he says that developing countries need to draw up national social protection strategies consistent with their circumstances, values and experience and closely bound up with economic development strategies so as to devise an overall development strategy. In this way, efforts to improve the standard of living through economic growth can be linked up with action to prevent some members of society from falling beneath acceptable minimum standards. There can be no doubt that the encouragement of democratic participation, support for human rights, promotion of a fair distribution of income through social security programmes and a strengthening of the spirit of solidarity betweeen the different sectors of society will help the developing countries to bring about the desired improvements in schemes of social protection.

Secondly, the brief mention made in the last paragraph of the report of the role and responsibilities of the ILO in connection with the improvement of social security systems in developing countries does not sufficiently reflect the demands of this role, which the ILO is called upon to play. I believe a detailed working plan should be drawn up by the Office. It could then be adopted by the Governing Body as part of the 1996-97 budget. This plan could also define the on-the-spot surveys to be carried out to see what the needs are in certain developing countries selected on a geographic basis in the field of social protection. In the light of these studies, it will be possible to draw up technical assistance programmes for the means of production in developing countries, and also to earmark the necessary funds for this purpose in the budget for 1998-99.

Thirdly, in our country we have acquired considerable experience in the field of social security benefits in connection with old-age, death, disability and occupational accidents. The State provides free medical care to all citizens and all residents. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs as well as various private associations play an important role in providing social assistance to poor families. Furthermore, the State tries to ensure that jobs are provided for the unemployed and organizes training courses with a view to improving the skills and technical knowledge of jobseekers, both when they enter the labour market for the first time and during their working life. These measures are characteristic of the social security system we provide for our citizens.

We will of course draw upon the positive opinions and ideas contained in the Director-General's Report in order to strengthen social protection in our country still further.

I thank you for your attention and I wish the Conference every success.

Mr. WHANG (Employers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – On behalf of myself and of the Employers' delegation of the Republic of Korea I take great pleasure in extending our sincere congratulations to the President on his election.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his choice of subject for this year's Report, which offers us the opportunity to discuss one of the most important issues of our time: social insurance and social protection.

Before leaving Seoul, I read the Report carefully and was touched by much that I found in it. Just as democracy, though not always perfect in its application, is the finest political system ever invented, so the institution of social security, though once again not always flawless, is the best social prescription for the alleviation of poverty, disability and disease and for the improvement of the level of welfare for the peoples of the world.

However, as the Director-General's Report so aptly pointed out, the system does have inherent negative factors associated with it. One of the most important of these factors is that the resources available for financing such social programmes are inadequate to meet the ever-rising needs of the welfare system.

I would now like to refer to problems in our attempts to lessen the gap between the resources needed for a comprehensive welfare system, and the capacity that is actually available. I would also like to address the issues raised in the Report in the light of Korea's experience in running its social security programmes.

First, I would like to refer to the scope of coverage of our programmes. It was generally accepted by all that there was a great need for coverage for people in the low-income informal sector that includes farmers, fishermen and self-employed people whose income and tax base are difficult to assess. However, in Korea, because of a lack of adequate funding and administrative difficulties that would hamper the coverage of the informal sector, certain programmes including medicare and pensions began by insuring people in the formal sector. The overall plan called for a first phase in which civil servants and the military were brought into the system, a second phase that covered teachers and the employees of companies over a certain size and, finally, a third phase that reached out to the self-employed and to members of the informal sector. In this way, coverage was extended to all in Korea.

Unfortunately, while insuring the formal sector could be done without any deficits, the introduction of coverage for the informal sector brought about serious shortfalls. These imbalances are currently met by government subsidies but this situation cannot continue forever.

A solution to the problem could have been found by integrating the insurance finances of the formal and the informal sectors, but people in the solvent formal sector objected strongly. The task thus falls to the Government to assuage the indignation of those in the better-off formal sector.

Second, I would like to touch on the effective utilization of available resources. In actual fact we can often find examples of the inefficient use of what assets are available to the programme. One case in point is the situation in the pension scheme whereby employers are effectively paying twice for the pension coverage of their employees, and the employees are receiving two kinds of pension. Korean employees receive severance pay on retirement, a scheme that went into effect in accordance with the Labour Standard Act before the introduction of the national pension programme. This lump-sum payment was designed to give employees enough money to live on during their retirement.

When the national pension scheme was introduced, the idea was that the accruals made for the lump-sum payments would be integrated into the pension fund. However, due to the employees' strident objections, this did not happen. This led to the current situation, where resources are wasted by a double charge to the employers and a double benefit to the employees. Clearly, this type of waste should not be allowed to occur during the process of transferring from one system to another.

Another waste of resources is the so-called financial leakage which comes from the inefficient operation of the scheme. It cannot be denied that large sums are wasted annually through inappropriate payments to people who are not really in need.

Thirdly, I would like to refer to the issue of how most effectively to operate the insurance fund. Insurance premiums, particularly for the pension fund, should be administered on the basis of increasing capital to the maximum degree. The best way to do this is to deposit the funds in financial institutions that pay the highest rate of interest consonant with safety. However a considerable portion of the fund has been invested at low interest with institutions which have the primary purpose of developing the national economy. The larger the portion of the fund so invested, the more difficult it is for the fund to grow. The dilemma is, however, that the fund cannot be used totally for the sake of fund growth. For this reason there is an ongoing conflict between the ministry in charge of economic planning and the ministry concerned with social security issues about the utilization of social security funds.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that social security programmes should be made essentially free from deficits by institutionalizing the prevention of double benefits and inappropriate payments, and by maximizing the funds' profitability, as mankind's need for welfare and happiness is infinite and the resources to support social programmes are limited. I firmly believe that nobody wants to be rebuked by his progeny for handing them a debt-ridden social security system caused by poor management of the programme. We should remember that social security schemes are designed not just to safeguard the present generation, but also our descendants.

Finally, I would like to point out that social security is not a panacea that will totally dispense with the unhappiness brought about by want, disability and disease. It is very important to realize that such schemes are only complementary to self-help. The government should make every effort to eradicate the people's overexpectations regarding the social security programme. A person should himself develop his ability to avoid want and the consequences of disease and disability. When society as a whole grasps this point, social security programmes will become more effective and better developed. The dissemination of this attitude and the elevation of understanding of this principle are tasks before us all, and the ILO has a major role in this respect.

For these purposes the ILO should strengthen its technical cooperation programme in order better to assist member countries in their operation of social programmes, by providing guidance and know-how to those countries which have little experience in this area. The ILO should also focus its energy in order that member countries may strive to create new job opportunities, institute the necessary education and training, and conduct rehabilitation programmes in accordance with their situation and ability. When these policies have been successfully implemented, social security programmes, as supplements to self-help, will attain their purpose, and the ILO will accomplish its fundamental goals.

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) – On behalf of the Singapore delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his able leadership and guidance, this session will proceed smoothly to a successful conclusion.

We are meeting under more favourable economic circumstances this year, compared to last year. The world economy is expected to be stronger in 1993. However, growth will not be evenly distributed. The developed and industrial countries, such as some EC members, the United States and Japan, are not expected to recover from their current economic difficulties.

Better economic performance is expected from East and South East Asian countries which have enjoyed strong economic growth since the 1980s. Increasing domestic consumption and rising regional trade have kept their export-oriented economies growing rapidly even though the leading industrialized markets in Europe and the United States are hit by economic slow down. So, at current rates of growth, the Asian economies are fast catching up with those in the western developed countries. Asian economies are increasingly becoming important players in global trade, investment and technology transfer. They will be the engine of growth for the Asia Pacific Basin countries.

The newly industrializing Asian economies, namely Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea and Singapore, are enjoying growth which will enable them to join the rank of developed economies in another 10 to 20 years. Not far behind the NIEs are the emerging NIEs, including countries in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations of which Singapore is a member.

Rapid economic progress achieved by the NIEs and ASEAN member countries has resulted in significant improvements in the social and economic conditions for their citizens. Millions of workers are enjoying higher income and standard of living. It is therefore inappropriate for some critics and human rights activists to focus narrowly on whether these countries have fully complied with certain labour or human rights standards. By doing so, such critics have deliberately chosen to ignore these countries' achievements in bringing about economic growth to give their citizens a better life.

So, the role of a government in economic development is to provide a favourable environment for its citizens to live in security and to pursue intellectually, culturally and economically rewarding activities. When my country, Singapore, became independent in 1965, the most urgent task confronting the Government was to provide jobs to help the 1.9 million Singaporeans to meet their basic needs for food, shelter and security. As a small country with a small domestic market, Singapore was confronted by exceptional difficulties. The Government's strategy was to invite foreign investors and multinational corporations to launch an industrialization programme to create employment opportunities. For this strategy to be successful, the Government needed the cooperation of trade unions and employers to develop and maintain an environment of industrial peace and social stability. These were the essential conditions for Singapore and, I believe, for many other developing countries to attract foreign investments and to achieve economic growth.

The successful creation of a favourable climate for investment and growth has offered MNCs and foreign investors a secure and attractive location for business and investment in Singapore. This, in turn, has enabled Singapore to achieve 28 years of steady economic progress. With a per capita GDP of US$14,500, Singaporeans today enjoy a much higher standard of living with all their basic needs fully met. They also have ample employment opportunities. The current unemployment rate is less than 2 per cent and Singapore provides gainful employment for more than 200,000 foreign workers. More than 80 per cent of the people own their homes and every worker has sufficient personal savings for his old-age requirements.

The Singapore experience shows that economic and social progress can only be achieved and sustained through tripartite cooperation and teamwork. Workers and employers must understand that they have to work together as a team for economic growth. They must also work together with the government to create the necessary framework for enduring industrial peace and economic progress.

Trade unions, in particular, have played a crucial role in Singapore's economic development. Union leaders have taken the lead to foster a non-confrontational industrial relations climate. They have also encouraged workers to upgrade their skills and productivity. In fact, union leaders in Singapore are closely involved in organizing training programmes for their members to upgrade their skills. Their responsible and constructive approach has set the tone for harmonious industrial relations in all sectors of the economy. This has enabled the country to focus on increasing the size of the economic pie. And, as a result, the income of an average Singaporean worker has gone up more than eightfold since 1965, with inflation kept well in check. Workers in Singapore have clearly benefited from their contribution to industrial harmony and economic progress.

Whether or not countries in Asia, including Singapore and in much of the developing world, will be able to continue to achieve economic growth will depend on whether trading conditions in the world remain favourable. Unfortunately, economic stagnation in many developed countries has fanned new demands for governments to be more inward-looking and more protectionistic in order to protect and to preserve jobs.

So trade protectionism, in whatever form, eventually hurts those it seeks to protect. It hurts not only the exporting countries but also countries which embrace protectionism. Jobs may be preserved but only temporarily and at an absurd cost and a loss of competitiveness which rapidly increases the economic burden of protectionism.

In recent years, proponents of the so-called fair trade in some developed countries and international trade secretariats have tried to link international trade with workers' rights and labour standards record.

Let us not forget that the most fundamental right of any worker is to have his basic needs for food, shelter and safety met. Governments ignore such basic needs at their own peril. But governments must also be given the freedom to work out development strategies and goals which are appropriate to their own domestic circumstances, within the framework of their country's history, culture and stage of political development.

For example, the Confucianistic societies of East Asia place great emphasis on teamwork, corporate loyalty and collective responsibility in their pursuit of economic growth. This, however, does not mean that the individual's rights have been suppressed. On the contrary, by embracing and supporting national objectives and priorities, workers in these countries have seen their standards of living rise at a rate which has not been achieved elsewhere. The completely unprecedented economic growth achieved by the special economic zones of the People's Republic of China is a good example of highly successful economic development within a political system quite different from that of the West.

After more than half a century of economic dominance, the developed countries do have an obligation to help the developing countries in their pursuit of economic development. This will ensure that workers in the developing countries will also be able to enjoy a better standard of living. Economic growth would also bring about more global trade and investment, which in turn would benefit all countries, whether developed or developing. If at this juncture the developed countries also seek to impose their political and human rights ideals on the developing countries, the result may well be retardation of economic growth and a setback to the hopes and expectations of workers in these countries. It is not realistic to expect developing countries to conform to the labour standards achieved by the developed countries which are at a much more advanced stage of economic and political development. Instead, greater effort should be made to help create a more favourable environment for economic growth in the developing countries.

It is in this context that I hope the ILO will review its existing standards-setting process to take into account the different economic and political conditions and circumstances prevailing in the developing countries and emerging NIEs. Instead of focusing its attention on ensuring that developing countries comply with every word and letter in the International Labour Conventions which they have ratified, it is necessary for the ILO to provide more technical assistance to developing countries. Such assistance should help strengthen their capacity to compete in a world that is still economically very much dominated by the developed countries.

We should take advantage of the many changes that are now unfolding before us: the end of the Cold War, economic cooperation, free enterprise and the mobility of capital. We can finally focus on what humanity is capable of in terms of economic, technological and social progress. If both the developed and developing countries can work together to create favourable conditions for investment and trade, there will be greater opportunities to achieve higher economic growth and a better standard of living for workers worldwide.

Original Azeri: Mr. KERIMOV (Government delegate, Azerbaijan) – Please allow me to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election. We would like to wish him success in chairing this session of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office for a second term.

The main topic of the Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, is of great importance, especially for countries trying to make the transition to a market economy.

The failure of the administrative forms of leadership in the past, followed by the severance of economic relations between the States of the former USSR, as well as non-compliance with agreements by these States, has caused a deep economic crisis in the social and economic life of my country. As a result of this, the standard of living of the population is falling, which has led to social tension. Taking into consideration the economic and social situation in Azerbaijan, the Government of the Republic is adopting various measures to reform the social protection system by granting family allowances, unemployment benefits and is trying to create a new health insurance system. The Government is taking all possible measures to compensate for the inevitable fall in the standard of living, try to raise the level of wages, and to prevent hyper-inflation.

Basing their decision on an increase in consumer prices and in an attempt to protect the purchasing power of the population, the Government has set the minimum level of wages, pensions and fellowships, and increased the level of allowances for the poorest strata of the population.

However, the problem of refugees, the effect of an imposed war requiring the commitment of material and human resources, and the inadequate involvement of international organizations in this conflict, (over 600,000 refugees forcibly banished by the Armenian aggressors) are hampering the measures the Government is adopting to solve social problems in the Azerbaijani Republic.

Despite this, the Government is taking all possible measures to reduce social tension amongst the population. Families which have lost their breadwinner in the war are being given assistance in different ways.

This year we have adopted and successfully implemented an Act on pensions which has been drawn up on humanitarian lines. Neither elderly nor disabled nor single nor unemployed people remain outside this system. In preparing this legislative instrument, the Government has paid great attention to our economic situation, to national and ethnic specificities as well as the principles of social justice.

The most important aspect in this legislation is that in contrast to previous laws, this Act lays down no restrictions with regard to wage rates. All pensions are paid in full to all pensioners. This provides for the material well-being of the pensioners and also creates conditions under which skilled experts can be trained and retired experts can still be used in the labour market.

As regards the social protection of workers, the Government regulates the wages of this group of the population by determining the minimum wage rate. Together with traditional forms of social security, the Government is currently trying to broaden supplementary kinds of insurance, including medical insurance, and voluntary pension insurance. In order to provide for the social protection of workers a single rate is being developed which covers all sectors of the economy. This instrument will play a significant role in wage regulation, enabling wages to be adapted to the consumer market, and price rises and workers' qualifications and occupation.

One of the main thrusts in trying to improve the standard of living of the population is the prevention of unemployment. To this end we are drawing up a State policy on unemployment. We are implementing political and economic measures to regulate the labour market which are reflected in our employment legislation. We have developed national and local employment programmes and determined main ways in which we can solve problems of employment and unemployment in the country.

To involve the population in useful public work bearing in mind the local and regional distribution of the population, new flexible instruments dealing with the organizational and legal aspects of such employment are being drawn up. From the social point of view we should be able, by means of such an instrument, to provide for effective employment throughout the country. We have received recommendations from the International Labour Organization in this respect which has examined our legislative documents, including our instruments on employment and hope for further assistance in this regard. It has helped us to understand what provisions are needed and the role of government in the economic adjustment of employment.

Employment policy in Azerbaijan aims to increase productive employment. We are trying to improve our system of training and retraining, promote small enterprises and stimulate foreign labour migration.

To implement this policy, and in accordance with the provisions of the ILO Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), ratified by my Republic, we have set up employment and labour centres in all cities and other areas of the country. We believe that we have 300,000 unemployed persons in the current year and we are trying to pay attention to the social protection of such people.

In spite of solving some of the older problems in the labour market we are now facing new ones.

Our Republic has announced that 1993 is the year in which we must build up our State which is why we need the effective assistance of the ILO especially in terms of technical assistance projects and their implementation. We hope that in the next three months you will be able to send experts to Azerbaijan.

Because of our geographical situation we hope that ILO representation can be set up in Baku to help the republics of the Caucasus and of Central Asia and to improve and strengthen cooperation between the Government of Azerbaijan and the International Labour Organization.

Finally I would like to say that new countries trying to establish market relations need to improve social protection legislation. Therefore it is very important to receive enhanced technical assistance from the ILO in this area.

Mr. REICH (Secretary of Labor, United States) – I am honoured to be with you today here at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would first like to congratulate Mr. Asem Abdel-Hak on his election as President of this year's session. I must also congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to a second term as Director-General of the ILO. The continued leadership of these two gentlemen will undoubtedly benefit our work here in Geneva and contribute to the accomplishment of the ILO's important mission.

Throughout its long and distinguished history, the ILO has been committed to social and economic betterment among the community of nations through free and independent unions, employers' associations and governments. As the newly installed United States Secretary of Labor, I certainly appreciate the legacy of the ILO in the continuing worldwide movements to improve the lives of all workers. I can say, with enthusiasm, that I look forward to our work together over the next eight years.

An important element of the ILO's work is the body of international labour standards which the Organization has adopted over the past three-quarters of a century. I want to reiterate the United States' firm and long-standing commitment to the ILO's efforts to promote human and worker rights and to improve working conditions around the world, and to its machinery for monitoring and supervising the application of freely ratified Conventions.

Today I would like to speak about the ILO's other great mission: to increase employment. The scourge of unemployment is now sweeping over developed nations; its victims are disproportionately young people and the poor. The business cycle is not behaving as it should in most developed nations. While the United States recession ended officially over two years ago, in March 1991, the current recovery is not generating the job growth of traditional recoveries. Unemployment remains high. The situation in much of Europe is as bad, if not worse. A surprisingly large number of those who lost their jobs will never get their old jobs back again, and a disproportionately large percentage of the new jobs are part-time jobs. Moreover, the so-called natural rate of unemployment – the lowest rate which can safely be reached without fear of igniting inflation – may be rising.

Finally, the gap between high-wage and low-wage workers, the gap in earnings between the two groups, has been growing and this too is a trend shared in many other developed nations.

How can this pattern be explained? Some wish to blame imports from developing nations, but this is not the explanation; quite the contrary, more robust economic growth in developing nations creates export markets for developed nations and more jobs in developed nations. Open trade with Mexico, for example, will lead to more and better jobs in the United States.

I believe the pattern we are seeing in developed nations is the consequence of a transformation in the structure of all developed and – I should add – many developing economies. The transformation was gathering momentum throughout the 1980s; a squeeze on corporate profits toward the end of the decade has merely accelerated it.

Challenged by global competition and by labour-saving technologies, companies have been forced to move beyond standardized mass production to focus instead on profits and on services tailored to the needs of particular customers: specialized materials, custom computer chips, specialty chemicals, to name only a few. The so-called knowledge content of most goods and services is rising. Hardware is fast becoming a low-priced commodity.

This transformation has been marked by a shift in relative labour demand against less educated and lower-skilled workers within developed nations – those workers who are undertaking routine tasks – toward better educated and higher-skilled workers undertaking problem-solving tasks. Middle-level managers who merely implement directives from the top are no longer needed. Any services which can be obtained more cheaply from specialized vendors outside the company are out-sourced to them. Unskilled workers in the developed nations are being replaced by machines even if they are not replaced by lower-wage workers in developing nations.

The transformation also has put a premium on workers able to identify new market opportunities and to adapt technologies to meet them – designers, engineers, marketers, salespeople – who function much like management consultants. Although robots and computers are coming to do most of the routine back-straining work within factories or service businesses, there is an abundance of jobs for people who programme the robots and computers, who link them into systems, maintain them and exercise judgement about how they can be utilized for better effect.

This shift in relative labour demand has had differing consequences for the workforces of different nations, depending largely upon government policy.

In some countries – notably the United States and Great Britain – the shift has generated greater wage inequality. In the United States it also has resulted in declining real earnings for workers in the bottom half of the distribution. Both nations have tended to treat labour like any other commodity, allowing wages to fall and permitting employers relative freedom to lay off workers when demand slackens. At the same time, and largely because of this flexibility, both nations have experienced intermittently robust job growth. It should be noted, however, that the job growth has been punctuated by high levels of unemployment during recessions, and both nations – the United States and Great Britain – have experienced higher – ever-higher – levels of structural unemployment.

In other developed nations – including Canada, Germany, Italy, France, Sweden, Austria and Australia – earnings disparities have been less pronounced. The gap between high-wage workers and low-wage workers is not as great. Explicit government interventions in setting wages and providing job security have prevented what might otherwise be growing inequities and yet, largely because of this inflexibility in wages and in jobs, relatively fewer new jobs have been created in these nations, and average unemployment throughout the decade has been higher.

Does this new era of global competition and advanced technology require developed nations to choose between equality and job creation? Between active interventions which set wages and limit employer prerogatives, and free-market strategies which allow wages to fall and employers wide discretion? Worse yet, does it require them to protect their workers from exports from lower wage nations? To all of these questions the answer is a resounding No.

I believe that there is another, preferable alternative. It requires active intervention, but also allows wage flexibility and employer discretion. And it is perfectly compatible with open markets. This third alternative directly addresses the shift in demand in the labour force by emphasizing three things: first, good education, training and continuous lifelong retraining available to all citizens, not just a privileged few; second, the reorganization of work, placing greater responsibility upon, and allowing more discretion and initiative to, front-line workers; and third, investment-led fiscal policies designed to maintain strong demand for labour overall.

It is far easier to state these objectives than to act upon them. More money for education and training is necessary, but is hardly sufficient. The money must be well spent, and focused on the capacity for lifelong learning on the job. Reorganizing work around front-line workers is often talked about by employers but rarely implemented, because it requires a fundamental change in the relationship between labour and management. And finally, fiscal policies led by investments in education and training, as well as by public investments in research, environmental improvements and transportation and communications infrastructure, are difficult to craft in light of large budget deficits.

Yet I am convinced that the United States and other nations must pursue this third path. The implicit choice between equality and employment will fragment our societies and render us unprepared for the world of the future. Protectionism, in whatever form, will make us all poorer.

I applaud the devotion of the ILO to improving the quality of life and work for the world's workforce. Just as my predecessor Frances Perkins did at the ILO meeting in Paris in 1945, I too want to pledge the full and continued support of the United States of America to the mission of this institution – improving the status and expanding the prospects of the working people of this planet.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALBURQUERQUE (Government delegate, Dominican Republic) – I must begin my speech before the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference with twofold congratulations. First, I must congratulate the President of this new session, who has received the support of all the delegations and to whom we wish every success in his mission. Secondly, I must congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Organization, for both the wisdom he has shown in choosing social insurance and social protection as the theme of his Report, as well as the brilliant discussion of this subject, which is of great interest to all the developing countries.

From the 1980s, many countries in Latin America have been put in a situation where, either because of their own initiative in some few cases, or at the request of the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund in most cases, they have had to apply economic stabilization and structural adjustment programmes, whose objective is to correct distortions and imbalances which have led to an enormous deficit in monetary reserves, spiralling inflation and a depreciation in currency values.

As the Director-General states in his Report "Whatever the long-term benefits of these measures, it is clear that in the short term they have been associated with considerable social distress, partly because they have lowered living standards to more realistic and viable levels, and partly because they have entailed fundamental changes in economic structures and in the rules of the game, to which many social groups have found it difficult to adapt".

It is precisely within this framework that social security systems, with their diversity of structures and level of benefits, acquire special importance. Such systems can help alleviate poverty and provide protection to the most needy sectors of the population. However, it is well known that the complaints against social insurance in many developing countries are that benefits are insufficient and paid with great delays, that the private sector evasions are frequent, administrative costs are very high, technical competence very low, and technology conspicuously absent. Medical services are inadequate, the contribution of pensions is derisory and corruption in some cases undermines confidence and detracts from efficient management.

In such a situation, many have believed and proposed, in keeping with the liberalizing school of economic thought, that the best solution is privatization of the social insurance systems, doing away with their obligatory nature and the State monopoly in this field, and allowing the interested parties to establish their own protection plans against the hazards of life and work mishaps.

Despite the positive aspects lauded by the advocates of privatized social security, it is interesting to note that the experiments to date have required exclusive financing from the workers, that the replacement rate of pensions granted is not fixed and that the representatives of the protected members do not participate in the administration of the schemes. Moreover, there is the risk that private business is concentrated in the hands of a few and that enterprises are not privileged because of their efficiency, but because of good promotion and sales programmes.

It is much more prudent, therefore, before simply initiating the privatization of the social security, with all the risks that this involves, and the resolute opposition of large sectors of the population, to proceed to a substantial reform of the present system of tripartite management which exists in a great majority of countries, with the objective of restoring efficiency to the services, extending their coverage and endowing them with total transparency.

What we have and what we offer at present must be improved, since "Governments have a fundamental responsibility to ensure a basic standard of living for their people", as the Director-General says in his Report. The coverage of benefits must be extended to the family members of insured persons in those cases where this has not yet been done. Social services and economic allowances must be of a value which attenuates for and covers the cost of the aftermath of misfortune; the insufficient and late payment of old-age pensions must be corrected, and the high administrative costs and evasion of contributions must be resolutely addressed.

Obviously, this is not an easy task. Neither can it be successful in the very short term. But any delay in initiating the necessary reform would only worsen the situation, particularly if we take into account the fact that the modern sector of the economy is still very small in developing countries, where large sectors of the population submerged in this informal economy remain on the fringes of the social insurance system, thus forcing States to establish social protection plans.

In the Dominican Republic our social security scheme is not exempt from these failures which are inherent to all developing countries. Protection against industrial accidents has been guaranteed since 1932 and social insurance, which has a tripartite structure and is financed by contributions from the social partners, provides health, disability, maternity, old-age and survivor benefits exclusively to the insured persons or the wife of the member in the case of pregnancy and confinement.

A recent Act, as yet unpublished, extends coverage to family members of insured persons, and a whole movement has arisen amongst the interested parties and the public authorities to introduce the reforms required for the universalization of the system. On 17 June of this year, a seminar hosted by the employers, with the participation of the authorities and the workers, will examine and discuss the measures which can be put into effect to improve and extend the Dominican social security system.

Structural reforms and economic adjustment will be crowned with success only if they are accompanied by a social agenda and, amongst the measures to be taken in this respect, there undoubtedly ranks the subject of social protection which we are discussing here, where the Director-General has wisely made it the main topic for this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In a world in which the suppression of subsidies and price controls, as well as staff reductions, have affected the standard of living of the majority of the population, social protection policy must be seen as a complement to fiscal and monetary reform. Economic growth must be inextricably linked to a better distribution of wealth, to an increase in consumption capacity, and to the need to ensure that each person receives at least the bare minimum to live. In this field, much can be offered by social security, and therefore governments have an essential responsibility to improve, strengthen and extend it.

Original French: Mr. NIDELCU (Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Republic of Moldova) – May I on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Moldova extend cordial greetings to you and express my great respect and appreciation to all the participants of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, wishing you the best of success in your activities.

This is the first time that the Republic of Moldova has taken part in this prestigious international forum as a full member of the Organization, represented by a tripartite delegation, as called for in the ILO Constitution. We are convinced that our participation in the Conference will enable us to enrich considerably our experience and broaden our political vision. We are, of course, ready and willing to contribute actively to the work of the Conference.

The Republic of Moldova became a Member of the ILO on 8 June 1992. Since then a relatively short time has passed, and so it is not easy to sum up and draw any significant conclusions concerning our membership. We are only just beginning to assimilate the principles of collaboration with the Organization. Nevertheless, during this period the International Labour Office on the one hand, and the Republic of Moldova on the other have undertaken a whole series of activities for the purpose of speeding up the integration of Moldova in the ILO's activities.

We hope that the cooperation between the Republic of Moldova and the Office will grow in scope and strength and will develop still further.

We have two main pratical aims. The first is to develop a social security system for the population appropriate to the period of transition to a market economy. The second aim is to adopt national laws and regulations to the international standards of the ILO. And I must mention the fact that these activities, as is the case in the majority of East European States, are being carried out in a context of economic reform.

Social tripartism is a totally new aim of our national policy. With the help of ILO experts, we are absorbing the principles and rules of social dialogue. We are conscious of the fact that the tripartite system has a major role to play in achieving social consensus and the promotion of reforms in the field of labour and social assistance. Recently, we have developed an organizational structure for employers and have recognized their status as a legitimate social partner.

As regards our legislation, our aim is to provide an appropriate legislative framework for economic market relations. In this respect, we have promoted a whole series of new laws, reviewed earlier laws and regulations and adapted the recent, incomplete legislation to the new times.

I should mention that all our standard-setting acts have been drawn up in accordance with the international standards of the ILO, and some of them have even been submitted to the Office for expert advice. Among these laws of major importance, I should like to lay stress on those dealing with wages, migration, social security for the disabled, the use of manpower resources, individual and collective labour disputes and job security. The Parliament is now dealing with matters arising out of the ratification of the 20 ILO Conventions covering fundamental human rights and the principles of tripartism.

Among the many problems Moldova has to face, I would like to draw the attention of the Conference to the following three: unemployment, inflation and poverty. These are the problems which involve the highest social cost and have the most painful effects on the standard of living of the population.

My Government is concerned above all with taking steps to prevent mass unemployment. But our activities are hampered by our unfamiliarity with the problem and our lack of experience. In this context, we would be grateful to the ILO for the help it can give to Moldova in framing and promoting a macroeconomic policy for the employment market and adjusting the system of training to the new economic conditions.

In his Report, the Director-General of the ILO sets out a whole series of proposals, the purpose of which is to increase the scope and impact of the ILO's activities. The delegation of the Republic of Moldova generally supports these proposals and considers them to be timely and important. I should like to stress in particular the package of proposals concerned with the reorganization of the practical means for providing technical assistance. The creation of multidisciplinary teams and the involvement of the social partners in direct dialogue with the Office will make it possible to assess more accurately the priorities and needs of each State for technical assistance. At the same time, I would like to suggest that one of these 14 multidisciplinary teams should have in its terms of reference the coverage of the European States of the former USSR, which have more or less similar social and economic conditions.

The ILO is playing an extremely important role in furthering the democratic process and ensuring observance of human rights. An eloquent example is the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference which demonstrates once again the attachment of the Organization to the ideals of democracy and social progress. The Republic of Moldova firmly upholds the Constitution and standards and principles of the ILO. My country will make the necessary efforts to ensure that our national policy conforms to the social charter of the Organization and to international standards.

DRAFT PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1994-95 AND OTHER FINANCIAL QUESTIONS: PRELIMINARY DEBATE

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA) – We will now depart from the list of speakers and turn to the third item on our agenda which is the preliminary debate on the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95 and other financial questions (in Provisional Record No. 4). In accordance with Article 11*bis* of the Conference Standing Orders we shall begin this preliminary debate on the draft programme and budget for 1994-95 and other financial questions.

Miss MACKIE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I am grateful for the opportunity to make some comments on behalf of the Employers' group in relation to the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95.

I must first state that, however critical our views on the budget proposals, the Employers share a wholly constructive and positive attitude to the work of the ILO and to its potential achievements in the world of the future. If we did not believe in the ILO and have faith in the future, we would not take the trouble to criticize it, nor to offer our own proposals as indeed we have done and will continue to do.

We are very conscious of the fact that the document before the Conference is a programme as well as a budget. The debate on it is therefore the main occasion on which the representative constituents of the ILO can discuss the broad picture of what it is doing and what its priorities are. The document itself in its length and complexity is indeed impressive, and it obviously takes much time and work to prepare. This may be the best way to do things but the Employers' group on the Governing Body finds the whole procedure very unsatisfactory. It manages both to take up a great deal of time and simultaneously to provide inadequate opportunities for discussion of many important policy questions. It cannot be right that important departments and sections of the ILO's work should receive no more than perhaps half an hour's discussion once every two years during a long and complex debate. We very much hope that, following the improvements of the work of the Conference and the Governing Body, some improvements to the method of work of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body can be considered.

In terms of the content of this programme and budget, the Employers' group of the Governing Body worked very hard to consider in detail all the proposals made. We also responded in February 1992 to a preliminary discussion paper presented by the Director-General. We were somewhat disappointed to find that the 1994-95 Programme and Budget did not appear to reflect adequately our comments on that preliminary document. We had clearly stated that our support for the budget would depend on the response to our propositions, and in particular on the priority to be given to programmes designed to create and develop employment.

We supported a number of policy concepts, including active partnership and the setting up of multidisciplinary advisory teams, although we expressed concern about the details of implementation. We attach particular importance to the creation of an appropriate and flexible structure of management and staff within the ILO. We felt it was necessary to give attention to the details of a number of the major programmes around which the Programme and Budget is structured, but I do not propose to refer to any of those now – our comments are reflected in the documents before you.

We have supported the work designed to make savings in the organization and running of the Governing Body, of the Conference itself and of the regional conferences. We have naturally noted with approval that the work of the Bureau for Employers' Activities continues to be a recognized part of the programme and that provision has been made to increase its budget by the same percentage of programme costs as that provided for the Bureau for Workers' Activities.

In concluding my comments, I reiterate the point that I made earlier. The Employers strongly support the work of the ILO. However, we believe that it must change, develop and refine its work while maintaining its principles. We recognize much in the programme before us that we can and do endorse.

Original French: Mr. VANNI (Workers' delegate, Italy) – The main objectives of the 1994-95 Programme and Budget proposed by the Director-General are to promote democracy, to fight poverty and to protect workers.

The Workers' group supports these objectives. We subscribe to the three main pillars of the Programme and Budget Proposals because they are the same as those of the trade union movement. The ILO was set up to promote and defend the interests of workers. Certainly, this task remains closely linked to the democratization of institutions and the war on poverty, but even in member States where democracy is assured, workers' interests must still be protected. Therefore, the ILO still has a role to play.

Promoting democracy and combating poverty are challenges which the ILO can tackle together with other agencies of the United Nations, but the ILO alone is responsible for the protection of workers. It remains an exclusive priority of the ILO and must be reflected in a clear and unambiguous way in the budgetary proposals concerning the development of standard-setting work as well as technical cooperation.

As far as the Workers' group is concerned, there is no doubt that the main specificity of the ILO in this area, and this is something which it does not share with anyone else, is to promote freedom of association and trade union rights. Standards, related procedures and the supervisory machinery, as well as the capacity for providing technical assistance, are unique to the ILO and represent an essential contribution to the democratization of institutions.

The Workers' group has always fully supported the active partnership policy. We find it important for all three parties in the ILO to be actively involved in the Organization's work in the field. We agree with the concept of multi-disciplinary teams which will be called upon to play a key role in this context. We also agree with the interdepartmental projects.

Concerning the allocation of resources, we accept the increase which has been put forward concerning the funds to be allocated to regional projects. We do not object to certain activities being transferred to the regions, but we call for greater coordination between Geneva and the regions as regards policies and objectives.

Unfortunately, it is not very propitious at this session of the Conference to have a long debate on the question of the resources, income and expenditure. For the third consecutive time, we have a zero-growth budget. Everyone is aware that this is inadequate if the ILO is to assume all its responsibilities and carry out its mandate adequately in the present economic and social circumstances. In the past three years our Workers' group and all the ILO member countries have been overwhelmed by a tidal wave which has continuously altered the conditions of workers in many countries. Witness the new situations in Africa and Eastern Europe; structural adjustment accompanied by the continuing growth of poverty and unemployment; the legislative reforms (the ILO has received 52 requests for such technical assistance); the processes of regional integration which affect the economic and social conditions of hundreds of millions of workers around the world.

These trends will not disappear in the next biennium. Quite the contrary. The ILO's response to all these challenges? Zero growth. In fact, negative growth cannot even be maintained as evidenced by the reductions in the budget for 1993. Zero growth means that the Organization has no reserves, no margin in its resources. It only takes one or several member States not to pay their contribution in full, for us to find ourselves short of funds and in a state of crisis.

Of course, we know the classic response to all these arguments, and we therefore hope that governments will at least manage to pay their contributions for 1994-95 in full and on time. The Governing Body has made every possible effort to reduce costs and to bring about reforms, with support from the Workers' group. But it is very difficult simply to continue along this path.

(Mr. Abdel-Hak takes the chair.)

Mr. GHARAGOZLU (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The Programme and Budget Proposals for 1994-95 were discussed in the Finance Committee of this Conference yesterday. These comprehensive proposals deserve to be considered thoroughly.

On behalf of my delegation, I have a few observations. Regarding the multi-disciplinary teams and the philosophy of providing assistance and services to the regions and subregions, my country belongs to a region in which a multi-disciplinary team should rightly be established. My country wishes to become an active partner in the labour field in this subregion. This could be followed by the reopening of the ILO office in Teheran in the near future.

Another point which I would like to refer to concerns the rates of assessments of the contributions of member States, which are not usually elaborated upon in the Conference Finance Committee. This is why the assessment of the contribution is made in the United Nations system. But I wish to indicate that new measures have been taken by my Government for a restructuring programme in respect of our currency's exchange rate; this has been communicated to the IMF and will be used as a basis for assessment by the United Nations. I only mention this so that it may be included in the record of this session of the Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. SHARAF (Government delegate, Jordan) – On behalf of the delegation of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, on my own behalf, and on behalf of the region to which I belong, I should first like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the chair of the present session. We are all familiar with your activities as a trade union leader in the Arab countries and in Africa. I also have pleasure in extending warmest greetings to the delegations of Azerbaijan, the Slovak Republic and the Czech Republic, who have recently become Members of the ILO.

In the first part of his Report, the Director-General of the ILO dealt with an important and indeed vital subject – social insurance and social protection, which are among the main pillars of progress in the twentieth century inasmuch as they ensure peace of mind and stability for workers and their families, afford protection against social vicissitudes and meet the fundamental requirements of all members of society. They furthermore constitute a basic human right. We therefore fully agree with the Director-General's analysis in his Report to the effect that societies with an acceptable level of democracy, which respect human rights and human dignity, encourage an equitable distribution of income and wealth, and allow the individual full emancipation are those best equipped for the promotion of social protection and the improvement of standards of living.

The Government of my country has since 1980 extended the application of social security systems to all workers covered by the Jordanian Labour Code. To that end, social security law No. 30 of 1978 set up the General Directorate of Social Security with a tripartite governing body composed of representatives of the Government, employers and trade unions. The provisions of the law on social security were applied first of all in the form of a pension, disability and death benefit scheme and an industrial accidents and diseases insurance scheme. We began with large enterprises and gradually moved on to small and medium-sized enterprises. Currently, all workers in these enterprises are entitled to social security benefit without any discrimination on grounds of nationality, type of labour contract or the amount of renumeration. As to the entitlements of Jordanian workers abroad, for which there was no provision initially in the gradual application of the Social Security Code, the General Directorate of Social Security decided to offer them optional access with effect from 1986. The vast majority of workers in my country thus currently enjoy compulsory social coverage. At the same time, each individual has the right, regardless of occupation or place of residence, to optional social insurance, pending the introduction of a compulsory scheme for all.

The current session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the Israeli authorities continue to tighten their stranglehold on the occupied Palestinian territories in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. These measures deprive many Arab workers of their source of income and their work in economic Israeli sectors. The Arab Labour Conference, which was held in the capital of my country in April, appealed to the Director-General of the ILO to use his good offices with the occupation authorities so that they loosen their stranglehold. The Jordanian Government reiterated this appeal to the Director-General and the mission of inquiry regarding Palestine and the occupied Arab territories that visited Jordan in December and January 1993. My Government requested the mission of inquiry to take steps to have pressure exerted on the Israeli occupation authorities so that they pay the allowances due to the Arab workers who were dismissed in 1991 and 1992. This request is in accordance with international labour standards, especially since the Israeli Labour Code itself provides for the payment of such benefit. Over 85 per cent of the workers who were dismissed did not receive any of the allowances due to them, although they constitute an important part of their social protection.

In conclusion, I should like to commend the excellent relationship of cooperation between my country and all units of the ILO. I should also like to pay tribute to the Director-General, the members of the Governing Body and the entire staff of the ILO for their tireless efforts to enhance all aspects of this cooperation. I should like once again to wish the Conference every success. May it contribute to social construction and stability for the benefit of humanity as a whole in a world that will hopefully be guided by the principles of justice, equality and democracy.

Original Arabic: Mr. ZAHRAN (Government delegate, Egypt) – The election of Mr. Abdel-Hak to the presidency of the International Labour Conference bears witness to the confidence the Conference has in his competence and skill in chairing our debates, and it is a tribute not only to Egypt but to all African and Arab States. Egypt has always defended the rights of working people throughout the world and continues to do so. It has also defended the achievements of the period of national liberation, carried the torch in the struggle for the liberation of peoples seeking to free themselves from the yoke of exploitation and always defended the working classes in their struggle to assert their legitimate rights, especially the right to work and to choose work freely.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his election to a second term of office. The choice is a natural one, since it is thanks to his efforts that the working procedures of the ILO have been modernized to meet the challenges to which you referred in your opening address. This is the 80th International Labour Conference. Next year the ILO will be celebrating its diamond jubilee and it will also be the golden jubilee of the Declaration of Philadelphia. For that reason we should now review the activities of the Organization. We must try to enhance its role now that we are at the threshold of the twenty-first century. There is no doubt that the Organization has acquitted itself well of the task entrusted to it and I am sure that the next stage will be for the Organization to preserve its role as leader in the international sphere. The problems which will be encountered mean that we must give the Organization the support it needs to defend human rights, extend social justice and promote prosperity for workers and their families. We hope that through the new multidisciplinary teams, the ILO's new policies will result in activities aimed at supporting technical cooperation and providing assistance to the social partners at the national level. We also hope that the ILO and the UNDP will find a way of enabling recipient countries to benefit to the full from the aid they receive. We would like at this stage to see the Organization play a greater role in the Uruguay Round of GATT since those talks will affect not only social and economic conditions in general, but also workers, employers and governments in particular.

I should also like to welcome recent newcomers to the Organization – Armenia, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Kazakhstan, the Republic of Korea, the Slovak Republic and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Egypt is convinced of the role the ILO has to play in reinforcing standards of social justice and that is why Egypt is involving it in a number of plans and projects for the benefit of the working class. We are drawing up new draft legislation on employment, and are setting up an employment information network, relevant to all sectors and activities, with emphasis on the private sector. This will also cover the informal sector with a view to promoting good employment relations as we approach this new industrial revolution. This activity has excited the interest of the highest levels of the hierarchy. It is also being examined in collaboration with the highest administrative levels of this organization. We believe this is an innovative project in the Arab world, since it strengthens the role that the ILO can play in this period of transition to a market economy while preserving stability and social peace. The Egyptian Government hopes that the new draft labour code will be ready by the end of the year.

We also propose that Egypt should be chosen for the headquarters of a project in support of the migration policies of the Arab countries which have been approved by the UNDP and the Gulf development fund.

We have carefully examined the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO in 1992. We would like to express our gratitude to the Director-General for all his efforts. However, we are concerned about the significant reduction in the expenditure on technical cooperation for Arab countries and countries in the African region compared with 1991 levels. We fully understand the constraints facing the Organization, which are largely due to the transition of many countries to a market economy. However, we hope that the aid to these countries can be financed by other resources or by new resources, and not at the expense of African and Arab countries. This question was debated in Cairo at great length last April during the meeting of the African Labour Commission, and in Amman, during the Arab Labour Conference. The countries which attended these meetings expressed their dissatisfaction with the situations. We request that expenditure be brought back up to 1991 levels, at least. The African Labour Commission called for the setting up of three new regional centres – for employment and vocational training, occupational safety and health, and productivity. Egypt proposes to be the host for one of these centres with the help of the ILO.

The situation of Africa in the field of development is of a very special kind and therefore requires special measures. The development of human resources in Africa is a major objective and a key to the continent's development. You have heard the plea from President Mubarak for help for the developing countries in this connection. I propose that the ILO adopt the pilot project for Africa in this area, setting up a special fund with contributions from donor countries, supplemented by a special ILO programme.

As concerns the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, we agree with it entirely. Although many different types of social security systems have been set up in developing countries, individuals receive few benefits. There are many reasons for this. In the case of Egypt, we are faced with this problem, particularly since the informal sector is huge and attracts many jobseekers who have been affected by the worldwide economic crisis, not to mention the adverse effects of the Gulf war. Egypt has set up a social development fund to alleviate the harmful effects of the economic restructuring taking place in Egypt. This fund is part of our social safety net. We would invite other countries to examine our experience in this field. We call on the ILO to draw up a programme for the exchange of experience among countries. We agree with the Director-General when he says that the problem of inadequacy of social security schemes is an integral part of a much broader problem of economic and social development. To remedy the situation, it is necessary for national capacities to be brought into line with international capacities. We therefore ask the ILO to intensify its technical assistance to enable States wishing to legislate in this field, especially in view of the fact that the experience of developed States cannot be simply taken over in developing countries.

We have examined the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, and Egypt will be speaking in the special discussion on that subject, but I would like to express my appreciation here for the team which visited these territories on behalf of the Director-General.

We have also examined the Director-General's Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, and I would like to say how greatly we appreciate the role played by this Organization and the measures it has taken to combat racial discrimination. Dialogue must continue in South Africa in order to eliminate apartheid completely.

Original Russian: Mr. KOLMOGOROV (Employers' delegate, Russian Federation) – Please allow me to associate myself with the congratulations that have been expressed to the President and to offer my best wishes for the successful work of this session of the Conference.

As a delegate representing the Russian employers, I would first of all like to support the topical choice of theme and the extremely constructive content of the Report of the Director-General, and to express my great gratitude to the Governing Body and the International Labour Office for the attention which they have paid to social security problems in those countries which have recently embarked on economic, social and political reforms.

I do not think anyone can deny the fact that the main objective of our reforms is to provide for the welfare and well-being of our people and society as a whole. Social policy can in fact be seen to a certain extent as setting the tone for the reconstruction of the economy.

At the recently held fourth congress of the Russian Alliance of Industrialists and Employers, we looked at a very wide range of problems linked with the radical restructuring of the economic and political basis of Russian society. These included the problems of our transition from a centrally planned economy to a socially oriented market economy, based on private ownership and freedom of entrepreneurship. I must recognize the fact that Russia, to put it mildly, has had no luck with these economic reforms. The timid, inconsistent and often poorly thought-out measures previously implemented were replaced in 1992 with an extreme wave of shock therapy which mixed monetarism and economic romanticism, but did not take into account the specific conditions of Russian reality.

The liberalization of prices, together with an excessively strict control of the money supply, the maintenance of state ownership and a high level of monopolization, did not yield the positive results which we had hoped for. We were unable to institute a normal system of finance and credit. The campaign against inflation failed as money was pumped into circulation.

At the same time, all these reform measures have created a new economic situation in Russia. Prices have been liberalized and in general terms horizontal economic relations between enterprises have replaced the old system. The basis has been established for new situation in Russia where we can see privatization and for new legislation in the economic field. The first fruits of a market economy are now beginning to show, and they will be decisive in determining whether the economic reforms in Russia are irreversible.

But this has come at too high a price. The economy of Russia has for many years been in a situation of collapse. The GDP in the first quarter of 1993 was 72 per cent of the corresponding level in 1989, and the volume of industrial production was only 74 per cent. For comparison, the United States in 1933 had a GDP 80 per cent as high as it was in 1929. Up to 1992 the development of the crisis basically took place because of the disintegration of general industrial processes, bad management and inflation. In 1992 this was compounded by the destructive influence of the collapse of the Union and the liberalization of prices, together with the excessively stringent monetary policy. Gross investments fell in 1992 in real terms to only 55 per cent of their 1991 levels. And there was no transfer of these investments to the sectors which provide finished products. There are additional difficulties on the horizon which will have an effect as we come out of the crisis, since many enterprises are only able to stay afloat by liquidating their fixed assets. The standard of living has deteriorated considerably. There has been a 39 per cent fall in retail turnover at constant prices in 1992. A number of vitally important goods and services are practically beyond the reach of most of the population.

It is now obvious that we cannot solve such enormous problems in a short period of time. We need many years to do this. The basic transformations are still in an embryonic stage. The process of changing the forms of ownership of property has only just begun. We still must create a market environment. There is currently a lack of competition in our country.

In 1993 and in the next few years we must try to solve a number of fundamental questions linked with the transition to the market, and the creation of conditions for basic market mechanisms to come into play. We must restructure, and implement an economic and industrial policy that ensures employers are free to act and workers are motivated to work.

In working out our new policies, we are trying our utmost to foster the development of business and enterprise and to protect the interest of goods producers. We also have to use the influence of employers to cut down on the social costs of the reforms. There should be a minimum social loss for the workers as well, which may unfortunately possibly reach a critical point. If that point is passed, opposition by the workers could be the main stumbling block to further reform.

The main short-term target for us is to try to put an end to the headlong fall in production, to normalize our financial and monetary system and ward off hyperinflation. This requires the social protection of the population in the broad sense of the word.

I would like to ask the distinguished delegates at this Conference to pay particular attention to some of the specific problems of social protection for workers, which I will now mention. I will also bring up certain methods which we would like to propose to deal with those problems in Russia.

One of the key problems is overcoming inflation. We believe that we should have balanced market prices. In order to deal with the internal contradictions this problem involves, we feel that we must carry out a combination of measures. These include limiting the money supply of both cash and credit, balancing income and expenditure of the population and enterprises, reducing the deficit in the state budget, and carrying out a number of other measures aimed at stabilizing the rouble, with a voluntarily agreed freeze on prices for enterprises and consumer prices on the basis of cartel agreements.

Such a policy of voluntarily agreed price freezes is already beginning to be carried out by associations of producers of industrial and agricultural products, with the involvement of a contingency fund. We believe that cartel agreements could be concluded in other fields as well, basically in two forms: between the consumers of a certain type of production, establishing a maximum level of prices on the production which is bought, and also agreements between industrialists, establishing profitability limits for the production which they sell. We know that the conclusion of cartel agreements is an extremely complicated matter which requires great efforts from entrepreneurs, trade unions and the Government. Branch-level agreements between workers, trade unions and the Government may also help to reinforce cartel agreements and in this way might be able to promote a situation whereby trade unions would desist from making economically unjustified claims, and employers would desist from making profits which go above and beyond the framework of the agreements and be obliged to earmark a proportion of their profits for additional social assistance for workers.

Russia once had experience of cartel agreements, but is now having to start over again. We know that many States have been negotiating such agreements for many years, and we would be very grateful if the delegates from these countries would give us some assistance and advice.

We are also counting on the experience of the ILO in dealing with the threat of mass unemployment.

Before us is also the urgent problem of bankruptcy. We know that many bankruptcies are inevitable. However, you must take into account the fact that the present catastrophic situation of many enterprises in Russia is often, and to a large extent the result of incompetent interference in their running by the State, and of mistakes that were made at the early stage of our reforms. The ruin of many of these enterprises has even reached sectoral or state level. When many monopolies exist a domino effect takes place, and in this situation when culling loss-making enterprises we must try to avoid inflicting irreversible losses on the countries of the CIS, and the CMEA, and the harming of the Russian economy. This is why it is so important for us, taking heed of the experience of associations, industrialists and employers of all countries to continue the constructive exchange of opinions which began at the International Congress of Industrialists and Employers which was held on 24 and 25 May 1993 in Budapest.

I have concentrated on the economic aspects of social insurance and protection because these tasks can only be effectively addressed on the basis of a sound economy.

It is therefore important for the ILO, in its practical activities over the next few years, to give priority to the kind of "nerve centres" that will promote an essential combination of social and economic development, especially in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, which are painfully and laboriously contending with the transition to a socially oriented market economy.

The matters to be discussed at this session are certainly of the utmost importance. In informing you of some relevant problems and of how we are trying to solve them in Russia, we are counting on the understanding, support, advice and experience of the International Labour Organization, and we are in turn fully prepared to participate actively in addressing the main task of the International Labour Organization, which is the achievement of a social partnership for peace and prosperity.

Mr. LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) – On behalf of the Malaysian delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election. I am confident that he will steer the proceedings of the session to a successful conclusion. May I also offer my congratulations to the three vice-presidents on their election.

We are indeed happy to be present here to discuss some of the challenging labour issues confronting us. Throughout the world, far-reaching political reforms are being undertaken. The globalization of markets, the emergence of trading blocs and the rapid pace of technological development have tremendous implications on socio-economic development. In the process of resolving socio-economic development issues, the interest of all governments in uplifting the quality of life of society at large should be emphasized. Whilst the alleviation of poverty and improvement of working conditions are important, governments should be in a position to discharge their roles as regulators, moderators, conciliators and arbitrators in a market economy with some measure of flexibility.

Almost seven decades have gone by since the first international labour standard was instituted and it is timely for us to take stock of the situation and its effects on the member States. The slow pace of ratification, particularly by developing countries, is testimony to the reality that many of the developing countries are finding it difficult to comply with international labour standards mainly because they are based on the norms and values of the developed and industrialized countries, which may not be compatible with the cultural values and national aspirations of developing countries, given the disparities in economic and social development. It is this disparity which accounts for so much diversity in the global application of international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

Ironically, the debate over rigidity and flexibility of international labour standards has taken a new turn. Increasingly the industrialized countries are joining the ranks of countries coming under the scrutiny of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The issues today involve a reconsideration of the traditional social guarantees granted to workers to ensure the flexibility and competitiveness of the labour market.

At the recent 13th Asia and Pacific Labour Ministers' Conference held in Teheran, Iran, from 21 to 23 April 1993, 45 countries in the region called for more flexible implementation of international labour Conventions and Recommendations in labour administration. Toward this end, these countries, representing two-thirds of the world's population, called on the ILO to review and update existing standards so as to enable their more meaningful and pragmatic application in ILO member countries.

The difficulties of the developing countries have been compounded by the rigid and uncompromising interpretation and application of the legal texts of these Conventions, a large part of which were adopted on behalf of some countries without their participation at a time when they were not yet independent. Even today, financial constraints sometimes prevent developing countries from participating as they should in the process of drawing up new standards.

Rather than adopt new Conventions and Recommendations, the ILO should review some of its Conventions which are no longer of concern to the international community. There are some ILO Conventions which are of continuing relevance but are applied in a manner which is out of contact with existing realities.

The ILO should review its performance, its relevance and its effectiveness with regards to the acceptability of ILO standards in developing countries. We believe that the interpretation and application of Conventions and other labour standards should relate to national conditions and aspirations and, if need be, should be applied in stages in accordance with national development objectives. Malaysia, like other member countries, supports the ILO with regard to promotion of fair and realistic labour standards as a means of advancing social justice.

I would also like to commend the Director-General's Report Social insurance and social protection. The social security laws in Malaysia encompass pension and retirement benefits, health care, employment injury, survivors' benefits and maternity benefits. Social security provisions have been enhanced through periodic review of the coverage and scope of benefits. The challenge for us is to extend benefits to self-employed workers such as farmers and fishermen. The Government, realizing that the best protection in terms of social security is for workers to have access to continuous employment and mobility, will ensure that the labour market remains flexible and conducive to employment generation.

Furthermore, in our enthusiasm to improve the range of coverage under social security, we must take stock of the developments in developed countries, where, in an era characterized by mounting unemployment, industrial decline, inflation and ever increasing public expenditure on social security, even pioneers in the field are reviewing social security systems in their respective countries.

Malaysia also welcomes the report Prevention of major industrial accidents. Malaysia is concerned with maintaining a balance between economic growth and the improvement of occupational safety and health. Our current philosophy on safety and health at work is that the primary responsibility for safety and health at work lies with both the employers who create the risks and the workers who work with them. This philosophy is also the backbone of the new Occupational Health and Safety Act which is to be tabled in Parliament shortly. This legislation is aimed at strengthening the existing mechanisms for protecting the occupational safety and health of workers, increasing the coverage of workers and setting up safety committees at the enterprise level.

I am also happy to inform this forum that the Ministry of Human Resources in Malaysia is in the final stages of setting up a Wages and Benefits Protection Fund to help retrenched workers. This fund will give greater protection to laid-off workers who are affected by their employers' insolvency. The Ministry is also placing greater emphasis on nurturing a labour force that is disciplined, diligent, cost-conscious and productive.

We also wish to express our concern over the activities of some international trade secretariats to destabilize the industrial relations system in our country. The ILO should play a more active role in resisting and neutralizing this new form of protectionism which attempts to link compliance with international labour standards to free trade and flow of capital.

The Malaysian Government is of the view that more of the ILO's budget should be channelled towards human resources development, which is the key to productivity and to ensuring the continued economic growth of the nations. An HRD strategy has as its objective the development of a highly trained, highly skilled, technologically oriented and adaptable workforce.

With rapid changes taking place in the labour market, the ILO should channel more funds towards improving the capabilities of labour administrators. In particular, it should assist labour administrators in improving their understanding of the labour market and the consequential impact of economic and social policies on workers.

Let me conclude by expressing my confidence that the comprehensive agenda of this session of the Conference will enable all of us to return to our respective countries better equipped to deal with the various issues discussed both in the plenary and in committee. We are also willing to render any assistance to the ILO in discharging its mandate in the interests of workers and the society throughout the world.

Mr. DIRIA (Minister of Labour and Youth Development, United Republic of Tanzania) – It is a great honour and a privilege for me to address this august assembly. Please allow me to begin my remarks by conveying the warmest and most sincere greetings from the people of the United Republic of Tanzania. I should also like to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the Chair of this important session of the Conference and to wish him every success in fulfilling his responsibilities. I would like to state that our delegation is ready to cooperate actively in ensuring the success of this session. In the same vein I should wish to pay tribute to the other Officers.

Allow me to commend the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and the entire Secretariat for the elaborate preparation of this session, including the comprehensive Report of the Director-General and conference documents to assist the delegates in their deliberations.

I should also further wish to join the earlier speakers in welcoming the Republic of Croatia, Uzbekistan, the Czech Republic, the Slovak Republic, Armenia, Kazakhstan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Korea and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the ranks of ILO membership. In Africa there is also a new nation which has recently been born, Eritrea. We are therefore looking forward to welcoming the new nation to the family of ILO members when it duly applies.

The Report of the Director-General focuses on a very topical issue, that of social security. The choice of this topic for discussion is very timely indeed. The full achievement of this objective is often hampered by social deprivation which remains widespread, particularly in the least developed countries, in spite of the structural adjustment measures to speed up their economic and social development.

The current economic difficulties are attributed to the world economic recession. The impact of the recession on the LCDs has been further compounded by the fall in world prices of their major export products, the lack of market access, particularly by their processed products, and the severe deterioration in the terms of trade and an increase in the burden of debt servicing.

The unusually long duration of the current recession is also of deep concern to my delegation. This uncertainty in the global economic environment has seriously affected development prospects for the least developed countries.

Tanzania, which continues to implement structural adjustment programmes, has experienced economic difficulties which have led to the reduction of government subsidies for various goods and social services such as health, education, etc. The impact of these cuts has been mostly felt by low income earners and increasing budgetary constraints are also causing the loss of jobs, particularly in the formal sector. The implementation of the structural adjustment programme has, for example, obliged the Government to lay off workers – over 50,000 – who were public servants. At the same time, some 300,000 persons are entering the labour force each year. Furthermore, our unemployed labour force is expected to increase by 15 per cent a year over the next decade. In these circumstances the employment situation will be untenable.

This alarming situation which we are experiencing calls for a new approach to the challenge of developing a system of resource mobilization which is geared towards job creation in the informal sector, as well as better remuneration for the workers in the formal sector.

Unfortunately, the prospects of improving the unemployment situation do not remain that bright. With the expected increase in unemployment figures, the current concern is how to integrate the growing number of unemployed into some form of gainful employment.

As for the workers in the formal sector, who are receiving inadequate remuneration for reasons stated earlier, the Government has been encouraging them to engage in income-generating activities or employment on a part-time basis. This approach could be applied to other unemployed workers. However, in the case of part-time work for the unemployed, precaution should be taken to ensure that it is not promoted as an end in itself, as this might well undermine the availability of full-time work without making any significant contribution to the expansion of the labour market. Furthermore, some employers may take advantage of this situation to deny security of employment to workers employed under such schemes.

One of the fundamental principles of the ILO is that workers must be paid an adequate living wage. Lack of development strains the capacity of the economy to provide enough and adequate jobs, let alone providing wages sufficient to meet their basic needs. The long-term solution is hence strong economic growth, including advances in both the agricultural and industrial sectors so as to provide a decent livelihood for all those entering the labour market.

The international community, through the International Labour Organization and other intergovernmental agencies, could specifically facilitate a solution to these problems through increased technical assistance, the establishment of vocational training centres, which would impart skill and confidence to the workers, and by extending credit for self-employment schemes. These measures would ensure the amelioration of unemployment as well as extreme poverty, which still affects the great mass of people in many developing countries. Continuing poverty and widening disparities inevitably lead to an explosive social, political and economic situation.

Notwithstanding these odds, Tanzania, with its meagre resources, has embarked upon measures to improve the social security of its workers through the national and parastatal provident funds based on the accumulation of contributions of workers and their employers.

Words cannot suffice to describe our appreciation to the ILO for the financial and technical assistance it has offered to developing countries, and Tanzania in particular, in promoting socio-economic development. In this regard I should like to express the appreciation of my Government for the ILO initiative to send a team of experts to review the existing social security system with a view to suggesting ways and means of mobilizing financial resources, both locally and externally, for the support of the social security programme in Tanzania.

My delegation is of the opinion that one way of ensuring that the assistance given to the developing countries is utilized efficiently would be to ensure that local experts are fully involved. For time has shown that projects relating to technical cooperation which are formulated by the developed countries and international bodies for implementation in the developing countries have not fully met the objectives for which they were designed. In this regard it was observed during the ILO/Norway regional symposium for African English-speaking countries on the impact of structural adjustment programmes on their industrial relations system that it was high time a social dimension in the African context was incorporated into the various programmes being formulated in respect of Africa. This would be achieved if our countries were involved in the formulation and implementation of the programmes. It is therefore hoped that the use of local expertise in the consultation, formulation and implementation of various ILO-funded programmes will be further encouraged. On this note I would like to express to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, that following his address to the African group of this important subject it is our optimistic hope that those endeavours will be realized.

On the issue of the prevention of major industrial accidents, may I point out that major environmental hazards worldwide have found their sources within the working environment. One may regrettably recall the tragedies of Bhopal and Chernobyl and recently the fire in a toy factory in Thailand, and the aftermath of the effects of those accidents on the surrounding population. For those who were working in the installations at that material time, the chance of survival was clearly minimal if not impossible. It is not guaranteed that such calamities will not occur in future and workers continue to be exposed to the dangers that may be concealed within their workplace. In this context we highly recommend acceptance of the proposed Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents and I urge all of us to speed up its adoption and to become party to it. By so doing we will have made a significant step towards ensuring a better and safer life and creating a healthier working environment.

In conclusion I would like to address the state of affairs in South Africa.

The minority regime was given the benefit of the doubt when it began its process of reconciliation, and the world was justified in believing that a new day was beginning to dawn on South Africa. However, the current events have given us cause to doubt the regime's sincerity. To end the political violence and bloodshed that still goes on unabated, we strongly urge the democratic forces to bring the peaceful negotiations to a fruitful conclusion, in the absence of which we urge the world community to consider measures that will compel the minority regime to speed up the democratization process in South Africa.

Finally, we as members of the ILO would only be abdicating our responsibilities if we failed to ensure the complete eradication of the apartheid system and the establishment of a unitary, democratic and non-racial society in South Africa.

Original French: THE CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – As you know, with the new system of electronic voting, and as usual, in order to be authorized to vote it is absolutely essential for delegates who are replaced by deputies to fill in the appropriate form. That is this form which will be given to them either at the Information Desk or at the Secretariat of the Credentials Committee, which you will find next to Door 13.

It is essential this year that these forms are filled in if you are to be replaced, preferably the day before a vote, but in any case one hour before any vote. The reason for this is that in order to have a completely up-to-date list for a vote which takes into account any possible replacements, we have to have this information at the latest about one hour before any vote.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Mr. KEARNEY (representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) – Those who seek to hinder the progress of the ILO as it approaches the 75th anniversary of its founding, those who would neuter its standard-setting activities, and those who want to impose on workers worldwide a regime where all enterprises benefit from unregulated flexibility and freedom would do well to examine the reality of working life, particularly in developing economies.

Those who argue that the principles laid down in the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO and in the Declaration of Philadelphia are only relevant provided that they are read in the light of today's world, where social protection is regarded as a rigidity in the free market, should take heed of the appalling and growing abuse of workers' rights highlighted by the record 113 violations documented for this year's session of the Conference.

Those who see the recent changes that have altered the face of the world as a passport to unbridled exploitation by employers on the basis that the transition to a genuine market economy implies a process of structural adjustment with consequent sacrifices for those involved, particularly workers, should perhaps consider the recent tragic fate of workers at the stuffed-toy manufacturer, Kader Industries, in Thailand.

Thailand, like the rest of East Asia's fast growing economies, boasts the competitive advantages so beloved by those advocating deregulation, including low wages, minimum social benefits for workers and virtually no health and safety requirements. A month ago more than 200 Bangkok workers, mostly young women, paid for these advantages with their lives in the worst factory fire in history. All but one small exit in each of the four-storey buildings in the factory complex were closed off. When fire broke out, even these single exits were locked, the 4,000 workers being warned to stay in their work areas as "the fire is not serious". Within minutes, scores of workers had been burned alive, others fell to their deaths, while many perished under the collapsing building. A further 500 were seriously injured. These deaths and injuries were the direct outcome of worker exploitation, the negligence of the employer regarding health and safety, the inability of the Thai Government to implement adequate labour legislation and the naked greed of multinational companies hell-bent on grabbing a greater share of world export markets.

Those who now openly advocate abandoning the ILO's role in setting and applying minimum labour standards claim that the improvement of working conditions and the protection of workers against the violation of their basic rights and against occupational accidents and diseases is only valid in a world of full employment and that promoting social and labour legislation only promotes rigidities and hampers economic growth and employment.

The 700 dead and injured toy-makers in Bangkok would certainly have welcomed and benefited from some so-called "rigidities" such as the implementation of basic health and safety standards.

Opponents of the ILO's traditional role argue that work is assuming new forms that are ill-suited to the classical models of industrial relations. How true. But it is exploitation which is reaching new levels – levels which cannot be ignored and must be the subject of international concern and action.

Take Haiti, which has experienced the creation of a climate of complete freedom and flexibility for private initiative, accompanied by a corresponding clamp-down on freedom of expression and freedom of association. During the 1980s, Haiti became the third largest exporter of apparel to the United States in the entire Central American and Caribbean region, with an annual increase in exports of 14 per cent. In the eight years to 1991 real wages fell by nearly 60 per cent. Wages in better companies in the apparel sector are around 1.11 United States dollars a day. At the end of a nine-hour shift a worker is left with US$0.37 having paid US$0.44 for transport and perhaps US$0.30 for lunch. After paying rent, the average working family in Haiti would be able to purchase six plantains, two onions, two tomatoes, one and a half cups of corn meal, two seasoning cubes, half a cup of sugar each week – no wonder many working families subsist on bread and rely on sugar cane water to fill their stomachs.

Haiti's assembly sector has been wiped union free. Wages have been slashed, working hours lengthened and instant dismissal is the norm. Might not some so-called "rigidities" in the form of social and labour protection ease the agony of Haitian workers?

Haiti is not alone. In Honduras in April a five-months' pregnant 25 year old employee of textile entrepreneurs, Marisol, was forced to work continually for more than 24 hours. She started bleeding and was taken to hospital where she had a miscarriage. Union activists, though banned from the factory, went to the Ministry of Labour who sent an inspector to the scene. First the employer was out; when finally contacted he denied everything. The inspector left. The union activists complained again to the Ministry of Labour who wrung their hands saying there was no proof. A few days later, the woman had to return to work – matter closed! And still there are those who are demanding that all enterprises should have even more flexibility and freedom to exploit like this.

Nor is Honduras unusual. Golam Kabir Babul is the father of four young children. He is a supervisor in a Bangladesh garment factory and a union activist. He took part in organizing last November's strikes in support of demands for a minimum wage of US$39 a month, for the working day not to continue beyond 8 p.m., for wages to be paid on time, and for overtime payments and health and safety provisions in accordance with the law. Hardly excessive demands in the light of Bangladesh's booming export drive.

But, after pressure from garment employers, Babul, with others, was arrested on 27 November 1992, two days before the strike action. In spite of magistrates rejecting a request that he be detained in custody, police continued to hold him under emergency provisions, filing spurious charges that, as a trade union leader, he might be in possession of arms. It was not until the High Court dismissed these charges out of hand more than six weeks later that he was released. During this period in prison, he was continually threatened with beatings. Having had a serious stomach operation some time before, he pleaded with the police not to beat him, and had to borrow to pay bribes of more than US$500 to stop this happening. Of course, following his arrest and detention, he lost his job. Yet representatives of those who so harshly treated Babul and his fellow workers are among those demanding that the ILO abandon influencing the development of social and labour legislation which will, they say, only hamper economic growth.

Meanwhile, in Pakistan, independent studies indicate that as many as 8 million children are engaged as bonded labour, half a million of them, from 4 to 14 years, in the carpet industry. A handful of powerful carpet exporters are growing rich while Pakistan's carpet children are dying from TB, cancer and hunger every year. Yet, Pakistan's federal labour minister denies this, saying that "the carpet industry is not using bonded labour," flying in the face of all available information.

The siren voices demanding a diminution of the ILO's role want international labour standards to be limited to general principles without going into details or creating "useless rigidities". Presumably, the Conventions concerning the minimum age for employment are a "useless rigidity".

These same critics claim that top priority should be given to fighting poverty through the development of productive employment. Child labour encompasses the two major issues of unemployment and poverty. Unfortunately, the basic reason for unemployment in many countries is child labour. India now has around 55 million children engaged in servitude on the one hand, while on the other there is almost an equal number of young adults unemployed. Children are employed rather than adults, because of their physical and mental vulnerability and because they are cheapest in the market or are free labour.

People think that the root cause of child labour is poverty, but this is only a half truth. The reality is that poverty is the result of child labour. Only social and labour regulations can aid these and other exploited workers around the world. Without regulation, entrepreneurs will search out the very cheapest possible sources of labour, the areas with the minimum social and labour protection, and the most vulnerable communities. It is thus crucial that the role of the ILO be strengthened, not weakened. Ensuring the ratification of international labour Conventions and their subsequent application takes on a new urgency. Developing the ILO's advisory role in establishing a means by which internationally agreed minimum labour standards can be implemented becomes imperative.

All the evidence suggests that the ILO's reliance on the good sense of member States to apply even the core minimum labour standards is not sufficient. This is especially true in countries where a climate of terror or military repression results in the denial of worker rights and it is particularly the case in the free trade zones and "maquiladora" sector in countries around the world.

What is clearly needed is a mechanism by which trade can be used to aid development and improve working and living standards around the world. The International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation believes that this can best be done through the establishment of a link between trade and worker rights where the access to world markets would be governed by respect for and implementation of the core Conventions of the ILO.

Such action will require determination by the ILO and a recognition by GATT that trade cannot take place in isolation from all other aspects of the international economy. The ILO should immediately begin efforts to establish a dialogue with GATT on how they can jointly contribute to a growth in world trade resulting in better conditions for workers worldwide.

The attack on the ILO from employers who seem to want to turn it into a mere technical agency for human resources management must be defeated. The ILO must become more aggressive in defence of its core standards and it must not allow itself to be marginalised and ignored.

The horrific deaths of the 200 young Bangkok factory workers was a tragedy waiting to happen. It could have occurred anywhere in Thailand or in any other country with multinational companies interested only in today's profits.

These deaths, however, pose the question of what is the line between commercial imperatives and the exploitation and risks to workers. And if this tragedy is not a wake-up call to governments and employers worldwide – indeed to the ILO itself – there never will be one.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-OUN (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, it is a pleasure for me to join my other colleagues in congratulating the President on his appointment, and we are convinced that this session of the Conference will enjoy great success due to his leadership, wisdom and the assistance of his colleagues and the heads and members of delegations, not to mention the endeavours of the International Labour Office and its committees and all those who assisted in the preparation of the agenda items and other documents to be discussed during this session of the Conference.

The topic of the Director-General's Report Social insurance and social protection has been well chosen. This is a major problem at the moment, directly related to the social security of individuals and families in a world which is changing rapidly, especially in social and economic areas, giving rise to a situation which prompts individuals to seek protection and the assurance of an adequate income to be able to cope with emergencies.

Social security is a comprehensive, integrated system, and includes all the services provided by the State aimed at ensuring a decent standard of living for the population. These services include social insurance, the various kinds of assistance for the population, free medical care and education.

The State of Kuwait is concerned with social security in its broadest sense, because it recognizes the important role assigned to it in protecting the individual and the family and the many goals it must reach in economic and social areas mainly in terms of guaranteeing social integrity, cooperation and solidarity. To this end, the State tries to implement legislative instruments to guarantee protection.

These instruments include the Social Insurance Act No. 6/1976 which covers old age, disability, sickness and death insurance for all public officials, persons working in the private sector, oil companies, the self-employed, military personnel and members of the liberal professions. This Act covers other cases such as the termination of service because a post has been abolished, on medical reasons, retirement age has been reached or occupational injuries. There are many advantages of this Act, including the fact that it covers all those employed in the various sectors of activity, gives entitlement to pensions for the non-Kuwaiti military personnel who took part in the conflicts of 1967 and 1973, reduces the period of service for married women from 20 years to 15 years, and provides for the termination of services of an insured person after 15 years of paying contributions.

The system will be improved and provide for social insurance which grants benefits based on the number of family members in order to balance as well as possible income before and after retirement. The amendment to the Act will come into force in 1995 and will provide additional benefits for workers.

These instruments also include Act No. 22 of 1978 on public assistance which provides financial assistance to the individuals and families with financial difficulties and in cases of disability, to persons unable to work, to the families of prisoners, students, and to unmarried women. Benefits range from US$800-2,000 monthly, and are amended from time to time to keep pace with living standards. There were more than 10,000 families benefiting from these aids in the first half of 1992, which amounts to more than 17,000 individuals. The total amount of benefits paid exceeded US$38 million.

The third instrument concerns free education at all levels. The Government is engaged most seriously in eradicating illiteracy and to this end has established schools in residential areas, equipped with modern services and equipment and hired to qualified teaching staff. Suffice it to say that the number of students in a classroom is between 27 and 30 at the different levels.

The fourth instrument covers State medical services and introduces preventive medicine and treatment against all diseases. These services are offered in specialized hospital medical centres, dental clinics, mother and child care centres. The average population per doctor is 600 whereas the average population per bed is 319 which is considered one of the best rates in the world due to the fact that the United Nations praised medical welfare in Kuwait and the efforts exerted to promote and raise life expectancy at birth to 73 years and to reduce the mortality rate to 6 per thousand.

The fifth instrument covers State housing welfare and the construction of residential blocks and houses for medium-income families. The funds spent on housing projects exceeded US$1 billion in the period from 1985 to 1990 and were spent on building 21,000 residential units. In addition to these services, the State grants housing loans aimed at the renovation and expansion of units in need of such attention.

The State has an increased social insurance burden caused by the imprisonment of nearly 850 prisoners of war, who remain captive in Iraq's detention camps. The families of those prisoners are given benefits by the State which has dedicated itself to easing and reducing their psychological, social and financial suffering. The International Labour Organization, which is particularly interested in social insurance as can be seen by the adoption of many Conventions and Recommendations, is called upon to continue its efforts through extending assistance to developing countries, sending experts and through the services of consultants.

Kuwait, which has suffered a lot from aggression vehemently condemns racial discrimination in South Africa and in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Therefore, it calls for an end to inhuman practices in these regions and for compliance with the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the protection of civilian persons in time of war, 1949.

Finally, I pray to God the Almighty, the Powerful, to support us in our deeds and efforts so that our nations may keep their pride and dignity, to usher them forward in the direction of progress and prosperity in a world where social justice prevails and there is peace based on justice.

May the blessings and peace of God be upon you all.

Mr. CASIANO (Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform, Sudan) – Allow me to convey my sincere congratulations to the President on his election to the Chair of this important session of the Conference. We are quite confident that his experience and wisdom will guide our deliberations to a successful conclusion. Our sincere congratulations go also to the Director-General of the ILO on his re-election. We wish to avail ourselves of this opportunity to pledge our support and cooperation. We would also like to congratulate the new member States which have joined the ILO.

The 80th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time during which our planet is witnessing radical and profound changes in the international arena. It is quite evident that we in the Third World are enormously affected by the wind of change with its far-reaching implications on our destiny as developing nations. Indeed, the International Labour Organization, like all other international institutions, tries to adjust its norms and policies to keep up with recent changes in practical and positive ways, especially in dealing with labour matters throughout the world. In this connection, we hope that the outcome of such efforts will help ensure that social justice and equality prevail among nations. We also hope that the ILO's efforts will help narrow the gap between the north and the south for the well-being and welfare of the working people everywhere.

We are quite sure that the ILO will continue its endeavours and pursuits for a new and just international order, and this goal could be achieved through its intensified role in technical assistance to developing countries in the context of the new orientation of the ILO towards field activities.

Turning to the main theme of the Conference, let me congratulate the Director-General on the appropriate selection of the topic of Social insurance and social protection. We believe that the Director-General is right to give attention to such protection of life among the working people. We consider that the programmes proposed by the Director-General to help member States in this connection are workable and reasonable.

In the Sudan, we have embarked on the implementation of a three-year economic salvation programme for 1991-1993 to achieve the following main objectives: (1) enhancement of the productive sector; (2) mobilization of human and other resources to serve the programme; (3) establishment of social equilibrium to avoid activating the economy at the expense of economically vulnerable groups.

Within the context of this objective, which is related to the discussion of social insurance and social protection, we have applied a broad-based social welfare system to enable limited income groups (in the government service and elsewhere) to cope better with any inflationary pressures emanating from the process of restructuring and liberalization of the economy. Some significant achievements in this system could be summarized as follows:

The Social Insurance Act introduced in 1974 provides old age, sickness and employment injury benefits. It was amended in 1990 to include further substantial benefits, including full wage coverage, widening the umbrella of coverage to incorporate establishments employing ten workers instead of 30 workers, and extending geographical coverage as well. The Social Insurance Fund Tripartite Board of Administration is focusing its attention on developing the system in areas of sound investment, modernization and ensuring more incremental benefits to the workers.

The National Pension Fund was established under the National Pension Act, as an independent tripartite body having its own legal structure. The pensions' umbrella was extended to cover all government employees working in the public sector.

The Public Service Pension Act of 1975 was amended in 1992 to include the following benefits: (a) an increase in the maximum pension from 75 per cent to 83.3 per cent of the last salary; (b) an increase in the amount of after-service gratuities; (c) the addition of the equivalent of one-third of pensionable service for workers who complete 25 years of service; (d) the counting of leave without pay as pensionable service.

A social solidarity fund has been established to combat poverty. This fund offers social assistance to disadvantaged groups of society in the following forms: (a) cash assistance for needy families; (b) assistance in kind in the form of goods and services; (c) the provision of subsidized goods and services to specific vulnerable social groups; (d) assistance for production in the form of tools enabling individuals and families to produce certain goods and services.

The "Zakat" (endowment) system which is institutionally applied in the Sudan offers a wide spectrum of social protection.

A Supreme Tripartite Council for Wages was established in 1990 to review the wages periodically to take account of the negative effects of inflation on the real incomes of workers. Within a three-year period, the minimum wage has been tripled. Wages above the minimum level have been considerably increased through collective bargaining between employers and workers.

The Sudan has adopted a ten-year comprehensive national strategy in which emphasis has been placed on human resource development. Areas identified in this connection include education, improved health care, food security, nutrition, increased access to safe water and sanitary services, generation of productive employment for all and the enhancement of popular participation.

In the area of social protection, objectives have clearly been specified as follows: (1) extension of the social insurance umbrella to include all citizens; (2) enactment of unified social assistance legislation; (3) recourse to popular, voluntary and charitable organizations to gear their efforts towards social solidarity.

On the labour scene, the remarkable event this year has been the election of trade unions under the 1992 Trade Unions Act. These elections were freely conducted under the supervision of neutral committees approved by the trade unions. The outcome was thus democratic and fair.

I take this opportunity to make to this esteemed gathering a brief mention of one of the problems which is an obstacle in our path towards development, namely the war in the south of the country. The Government is keen to achieve a peaceful settlement to this unfortunate conflict. The recent peace talks in Abuja under the guidance of the President of Nigeria, Mr. Ibrahim Babangida, were a positive step forward in our pursuit for peace.

In conclusion, our delegation would like to reiterate its total and unflinching support to the people of South Africa in their successful drive to dismantle apartheid. We also strongly stand beside the people of Bosnia in their struggle to preserve their independence against the atrocities of ethnic cleansing and genocide.

Original Arabic: Mr. OULD HAYE (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Youth and Sports, Mauritania) – I would like at the outset to express to the President, on behalf of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and, through him, to the Arab Republic of Egypt, our felicitations on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am certain that he will discharge his functions as excellently as possible in view of his abilities and wisdom. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on the occasion of his re-election as the Director-General of the ILO. I would also like to thank and express our appreciation to the International Labour Office for its propitious efforts in the preparation of this session of the Conference. I am also duty-bound to welcome the States that joined the ranks of our Organization after the last session.

The Director-General of the ILO, in his Report this year, tackles the subject of social insurance and social protection in the member States and the role that could be played by the ILO in helping make these systems more effective. There is no doubt about the importance and topicality of this subject especially as regards developing countries, where social protection in most cases is adversely affected by and has repercussions on the economic situation in view of the scarcity of resources, structural adjustment programmes and the transition to a market economy.

The Government of Mauritania has attributed to social protection a pivotal role in its development programmes out of its belief in the close relationship between economic development and social protection. Therefore according to the instructions of His Excellency, the President of the Republic, Mr. Maaouya Ould Sid'Ahmed Taya, and despite the limited resources and the difficult economic situation, the Government has endeavoured to improve social insurance services, the development of health care, welfare and employment policies, and combat unemployment.

In the field of social insurance the resources of the National Fund for Social Protection have been increased both qualitatively and quantitatively. Thus, since last year the retirement pension system has seen a 28 per cent increase and survivors and orphans are now entitled to benefit.

While maternity allowances were increased twofold, family benefits were also increased by 50 per cent in recent years. The health care and occupational accident schemes now cover occupational diseases and out-patient care. New branches of the fund have been opened in many provinces of our country to familiarize beneficiaries with their entitlements.

Within the framework of improving working conditions, constant efforts have been made by all concerned to increase protection at the workplace. In order to establish an integrated policy in this field last year we held an international meeting, in Nouakchott, in cooperation with the International Social Security Association, in which more than 20 African States took part. We also hope to convene a national symposium this year in cooperation with the ILO.

The National Fund for Social Protection is one of the most important mechanisms of social protection in our country. We are working towards developing its administrative and organizational abilities through the introduction of data processing and improving its working methods. I would like to thank the ILO for the advice it has given in this respect.

In the field of health and medical care, the Government has adopted a policy aimed at combating endemic diseases, providing basic medicines and establishing hospitals and clinics. Women and children are covered by various programmes which also promote the integration of women into economic activities.

Employment and fighting unemployment are among the most important interests of the Mauritanian authorities. Vocational training centres have been established to provide training to youth, with priority being given to sectors which provide the most job opportunities.

The provision of social protection of different kinds and its extension to include all categories of the population is an enormous and complicated process, as has been explained by the Director-General in his Report. Yet this process remains an integral part of the wider issue of economic, political and social development throughout the world. This is a mission that requires greater coherence and coordination between international organizations and governments as well as the social partners.

Thus, we hope that this session of the Conference yields clear-cut opinions and views on the issues under discussion, as well as strategies for work.

I would like to conclude by alluding to the difficult situation of the Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories and of the workers in South Africa and the importance of enabling them to overcome their difficult situations. We hope that the conclusions of the special sessions on these two important issues will have a positive effect on the interests of these people.

Original Vietnamese: Mr. TRINH TO TAM (Deputy Minister of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs, Viet Nam) – On behalf of the delegation of the Government of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam, I would like to express our warm congratulations on his election to the Presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate the Officers elected at this important session. I believe that, given their talent and experience and the cooperation of all the delegations present here, they will surely achieve the results expected of this Conference.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for the fact that the Governing Body of our Organization has reaffirmed its confidence in his ability to accomplish the important tasks of Director-General of the International Labour Office.

My delegation again wishes to express satisfaction with the content and quality of the annual report prepared by the Director-General of the ILO. Indeed, the theme of the Report Social insurance and social protection correctly reflects the situation and the concerns of member countries. As in many countries, one of our highest concerns has been to make best use of and to foster human resources for social and economic development in a world whose economic environment and international economic relations are not favourable to developing countries. On the other hand, the process of structural adjustment, socio-economic stabilization, and the transition from centrally planned to market economies have given rise to a series of problems, the solution of which has two aspects: the increase of labour productivity and employment; and the maintenance and improvement of social security systems for the workers. We hope to hear and to exchange ideas with the Secretariat of the ILO and other delegations regarding policies and measures to solve these problems.

With respect to the review of ILO activities in the past year, we have paid much attention to the Organization's technical assistance and welcome the report for its reference to matters of concern to us, ranging from employment and development, including migration and population; development of entrepreneurship and training in managerial skills; labour legislation and occupational relations (including those of multinational corporations); labour conditions and social benefits; to activities in the field of hotels and tourism, and so on.

We believe that the results of these discussions will be incorporated in the programme and budget of 1994-95 and that Viet Nam's needs for technical assistance will be taken into account.

Last year was a time when Viet Nam was able to make great efforts in the field of labour management. In our reforms we are continuing to shift from centrally planned to multi-sector economies, working in the framework of market mechanisms, and towards renovation.

Along with the fundamental achievements of socio-economic stabilization and containment of inflation, the Government of Viet Nam has been implementing new policies in the field of labour management. The employment programme has established concrete measures through the organization of workers in most of the administrative establishments, State offices, and state-run production units. Tens of thousands of workers who were unfitted to and ineffective in market mechanisms have lost their employment while many unproductive enterprises have been shut down. However, the State has also helped these people by providing them with funds and creating new jobs. The State has allocated a budget to establish hundreds of job centres which help to train tens of thousands of people, and many of these have been offered new jobs after retraining. Small projects have also provided jobs for many others while newly set-up state-run establishments, which are increasing in number, promise more job opportunities. Moreover, the Government has put into effect policies which will support new production units through taxation, particularly low taxes applicable to new establishments, as well as credit programmes with advantageous interest rates.

With a view to finding solutions to the problem of unemployment in rural areas, the State has established new policies for the redistribution of population and labour. We are moving towards an improved salary and social security system to improve the workers' living conditions, moving and move towards social justice and increased production.

We are completing a new labour law system, working out labour standards for workers' protection, collective labour agreements and so on.

Our activities in the field of labour, especially after our reintegration into the ILO, have benefited from close cooperation with the ILO. We have received technical assistance and the ILO has formulated a number of legal labour policies. Like other Asian and Pacific countries, Viet Nam is looking forward to benefiting from increased ILO technical assistance.

Finally, may I express the hope that further support from the ILO and other friendly countries, far and near, will help us to work towards our noble goal of providing jobs for everybody and realizing social justice in Viet Nam.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-DAB'I (Government delegate, Yemen) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me first of all to congratulate the President and other officers on behalf of my delegation. We trust that our President's long professional experience and proven ability will guide our conference to a successful conclusion.

I take this opportunity to commend the Director-General of the ILO and his staff on their valiant and tireless efforts to achieve the goals of the ILO, to implement its principles and to develop ways of enabling it to respond more effectively to the needs of its constituents.

My country is undergoing a process of political change and is making progress in the enforcement of human rights. It is not surprising that the Yemeni multi-party parliamentary elections held on 27 April this year captured international attention. They provided the Yemeni people with their first opportunity to choose freely who should represent them. The democratic experience has demonstrated the high level of awareness of the Yemeni people, who enthusiastically entered the electoral contest, increasing popular participation by enabling a number of different political parties to win seats in Parliament and broadening the scope of collective responsibility.

It is not surprising either that Yemeni women are playing a more prominent role in society, even winning seats in Parliament. By participating in the elections on an equal footing with men, they took a major step forward in their arduous ascent towards the occupation of positions of responsibility and the sharing of power with men in public life. Following the elections, determined action was taken to devise an appropriate legislative framework for democracy through constitutional amendments designed to reinforce constitutional legality and the multi-party system. To ensure the peaceful handing over of power, the presidency will be limited to two terms. There will also be a clear separation of powers, local elections will be held for all offices at provincial and district level and the right to political opposition based on free and fair competition will be guaranteed.

My delegation took note with deep satisfaction of the items on the agenda, since we believe that the development of social insurance and social protection systems in the member States and the ILO's role in improving their effectiveness are of the utmost importance. Social security has certainly been going through a phase of recession and retrenchment since the early 1980s. It is important to note that as a rule workers who enjoy job security tend to be more cooperative in changing circumstances.

Labour standards are important in that they encourage behaviour that prevents destructive side-effects from spreading to the labour market as a whole. Facile adjustment measures such as the lowering of wages, the lessening of job security and safety, and the less than full implementation of social security measures all lead to conflictual labour relations that undermine mutual trust.

Yemeni legislation has been concerned to ensure that systems of social protection are based on respect for workers' entitlement to accident insurance, retirement and old-age pensions, disability and unemployment benefit, health care and maternity and family benefits for both male and female workers. Pension systems for the civil service and other sectors have been developed.

As far as the ILO's technical cooperation is concerned, we support the Director-General's proposal to maintain the present level of direct support to the least developed countries, to promote new activities that link the technical and standard-setting approaches and to continue the search for new modalities that will make the Organization better able to respond to the needs of its constituents.

We welcome the proposed new approach involving an active partnership in planning the Organization's activities in the field and at headquarters, thus enhancing the Organization's operational capacity. The new department will replace the existing structure so as to ensure closer cooperation with field units in the future.

We are confident that the two new instruments before the current session will constitute an important step in the process of protecting workers, the population at large and the environment from the consequences of major industrial accidents. The ILO has a crucial role to play in this regard. The protection of part-time workers is also a subject that calls for serious discussion. Whatever the diversity of existing opinion, we should none the less be able to reach a consensus on the adoption of standards from which all stand to benefit.

The situation of migrant workers calls for further decisive action on the part of the international community to protect their interests, to ensure observance of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in their case and to guarantee their right to social justice, wherever they may reside. We hope that the resolutions concerning migrant workers will be given the attention they deserve in the ILO's programmes and projects.

A prominent feature of our era is the move to establish free and democratic societies, to secure respect for human rights, to make the environment healthier and pollution-free, to prevent industrial disasters, to combat unemployment, poverty and disease and to improve working conditions. There are a number of questions that deserve our attention and that touch on the very essence of human rights, for example the collective punishment inflicted on certain peoples – in Palestine, Lebanon, Iraq, Bosnia-Herzegovina, South Africa and elsewhere – which leads us to conclude that double standards are being applied. It would perhaps be fitting for the wealthy countries to find ways of writing off the debt of the poor countries and improving their economic and social conditions, of eliminating famine and disease and of reaching a peaceful and speedy settlement for the many crises besetting the world. All parties concerned must respect international law, statutes and customs so as to ensure that such settlements are fair and just and guarantee the rights of all parties.

The Republic of Yemen supports all action aimed at promoting freedom, social justice and democracy and calls for an end to the policy of apartheid in South Africa. We reiterate our solidarity with the people of South Africa and their right to freedom.

We also call on the international community to provide the necessary humanitarian assistance for the reconstruction of Somalia and the restoration of peace in that country. We congratulate the people of Eritrea on their country's independence and we welcome the new Members of the Organization.

Lastly, we hope that our Conference will be crowned with success, thus contributing to the welfare and prosperity of humankind.

Original Portuguese: Mr. HUNGUANA (Minister of Labour, Mozambique) – I would like to associate myself with all previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to preside over the business of our Conference.

I offer my congratulations also to the Director-General for the comprehensive Report on the activities of the ILO which he has placed before us. However, I do regret once again that this Report was not distributed sufficiently in advance for us to read it with all due attention.

After a long war – a war which is notorious for having been one of the most genocidal and destructive, and not only in Africa – the people of Mozambique are beginning to see the first glimmers of peace. That peace is the result of a prolonged and patient process of negotiation which culminated in the signature of the General Peace Agreement in Rome in October 1992. In spite of many delays in the implementation of that peace agreement, I am glad to say that the country is now quiet; it is urgent to consolidate this peace.

I refer to the political situation in my country to indicate the role which the international community, particularly the ILO, can play in the present phase of my country's history.

Implementing the peace agreement and consolidating peace in Mozambique depends upon the demobilization of the armed forces of the Government and of Renamo, and the constitution of new armed forces with equal participation from both parties. This demobilization will affect close to 100,000 men who will be released into the labour market; and yet they have no skills other than the skills of war. If we cannot achieve a reasonable level of supervision and help for these people in their reinsertion into society, it will not be possible to ensure stability in the country, or guarantee the preservation of our hard-won peace. Consequently, concerted efforts are required to finance labour-intensive works, to rehabilitate productive activities in industry and in agriculture and, just as important, to train those people in self-reliant and self-sustaining forms of work in the so-called informal sector. We are going to have to revitalize vocational training in order to convert men of war into the builders of a peaceful and prosperous society.

These areas fall under the competence of the International Labour Organization. If the importance of the connection between demobilization, jobs and vocational training is understood fully, the international community, and the ILO in particular, will make a decisive contribution to peace in Mozambique. My Ministry has already undertaken contacts in this area and we hope that they will lead to a participation commensurate with the enormous challenges which Mozambique has before it.

In compliance with the General Peace Agreement, a conference of donors was held in Rome last December. It was to mobilize additional resources for the rapid implementation of the peace process and to cover the financial requirements for the reintegration of demobilized personnel and refugees, and for the electoral process. There will be a follow-up conference in Maputo in this month of June.

Mozambique has also received support from the ILO, the World Bank, the EEC and the UNHCR in dealing with the difficult economic situation in the country.

The success of the democratic process in Mozambique will depend not only upon the capacity of the State and other national economic agents, but also on international cooperation which is so necessary to maintain peace and to achieve progress.

Hence, I beg to repeat on behalf of my Government, our appeal to the ILO and to the international community, which is represented in this hall, for the resources needed to deal with the reintegration of demobilized military personnel and of refugees and displaced persons, and for financing to create jobs, to reactivate vocational training activities, and to extend the social security system throughout the country, and for investment in the economy in general.

This very short statement has as its main objective to draw the attention of this Conference, of concern to the ILO to the specific areas in which my country needs help, in the interest of peace, democracy and development.

Before I conclude I would like to say that these concerns of ours are certainly not exclusive to Mozambique; they are not exclusive at all to the southern region of Africa; they cover almost the whole continent. However, I believe that we are beginning to see some of the basic conditions for a more positive and dynamic understanding of our problems than we have in the past. A recent sign – and perhaps the most imporant sign to date – of this new dynamic and positive form of understanding was given in a statement made by Warren Christopher at the African-American Institute, when he said that:

(The speaker continues in English.)

During the long cold war period policies toward Africa were often determined not by how they affected Africa but by what advantage they brought to Washington or Moscow. Thankfully, we have moved beyond the point of adopting policies based on how they might affect the shipping lanes next to Africa rather than the people in Africa.

(The speaker continues in Portuguese.)

In talking about the new type of relationship, Warren Christopher went on to say:

(The speaker continues in English.)

That it will be a new relationship in which the United States can assist Africans in building democratic institutions and laying the foundation for economic growth, but in which the role of the United States is to enhance, not to erase, African solutions.

(The speaker continues in Portuguese.)

As an African, and particularly as a Mozambican, I listened with great attention and interest to these new sounds arriving from across the Atlantic. Finally, the new winds of change are blowing once again over our continent. They are part of a global change and they carry with them the unambiguous sound of progress.

Original Spanish: Mrs. REYES DE LEON (Government delegate, Colombia) – I would like to begin by expressing my warmest congratulations to the President of the Conference and to the other officials for their well-deserved election. I am sure their efforts will contribute to resolutions and decisions which will benefit all our peoples.

Colombia is moving through a great process of transformation. The Government, led by Dr. Cesar Gaviria Trujillo, has been fulfilling a commitment to provide the State with instruments of modernization attuned to the new realities of our country and the world in general. Internationally, it is necessary to review trade policies, finally to place Colombia in the world markets. Domestically, the citizens have demanded increased participation in the decision-making process and in the regulatory role of the State.

This is the perfect setting, in the presence of governments, workers, and employers from throughout the world, to reaffirm the deep democratic convictions of our country and the unshakable will for civil society which is still at the heart of Colombian society. As we approach the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia our delegation is proud to be here, and at the same time to reaffirm understanding between nations and peoples.

I would like to review rapidly the situation of labour, employment and social security in Colombia. Since Act No. 50 of 1990 was promulgated, there were immediate benefits trade unions and employment. Over the past two years the amount of applications for trade union registration has increased by about 30 per cent as a consequence of the mechanisms laid down by the Act; this fulfils one of the commitments we made to the ILO in 1984.

This Act, apart from promoting the direct hiring of labour and job stability, strengthens freedom of association by providing stiffer penalties against persons who infringe freedom of association.

In the job market, the unemployment rate has gone down over the past year, thanks to more flexible contractual relationships, the creation of new jobs and an increase in non-traditional exports. In our capital city the unemployment rate is 7.5 per cent, the lowest since 1983; in the four most densely populated metropolitan areas in the country the unemployment rate has dropped from 10.5 to 9.5 per cent. The Government understands that in order to defeat unemployment we must achieve sustained economic growth. It is also aware of the fact that there are short-term costs in the fight against inflation and the liberalization of the economy. These costs, however, have not have been as high as the pessimists thought they would be, particularly as regards unemployment.

The obstacles we have encountered in our development efforts are basically linked to our former closed economy which was geared to protecting inefficiency, and to the lack of competitiveness. To deal with the challenge of generating jobs, increasing the coverage of public services and improving levels of health and education, it has been necessary to increase the employment level, which now stands at 10.5 million persons. Our approach involves the internationalization of our economy, based upon a solid process of modernization in our institutions, which began with the promulgation of the Constitution of 1991, and has continued with the restructuring of the State and widespread deregulation. In accordance with our new Constitution, we have undertaken a detailed evaluation of the structure and operation of the executive branch, so as to adapt it to institutional changes and to the redistribution of responsibilities and resources. In this context, we are suspending, merging or restructuring 63 state agencies so as to make more efficient the operation of a number of decentralized institutions. We are also transferring responsibilities to counties and towns, and freeing the State from responsibilities which, at our present level of development, can be better dealt with by the private sector. The autonomy of our regions, which is an essential part of political openness, has been furthered by our administrative decentralization – a process that has been widely supported by the people.

These processes make it necessary to redefine the type of training provided to the labour force. The National Training Service (SENA), which is responsible for providing training to Colombian citizens to equip them with the skills they need to move into the labour market is being restructured under a Constitution of 1991. The modernization of SENA will align it with the growing requirements of vocational training generated by a new development model; it involves programmes to relocate and retrain workers who have lost their jobs. SENA will be administered by agencies which enjoy administrative and financial autonomy, and with the active participation of workers, employers, universities, research centres, and NGOs.

As regards social security, the Colombian delegation agrees with the Director-General of the ILO that social security is a basic right and an integral aspect of economic, political and social development. That is what we believe in our country. Our Congress is now discussing a bill presented by the Government through the Minister of Labour which is aimed at increasing the coverage of social security, which now reaches only 20 per cent of the population.

This initiative, based upon the present Constitution and the principles of universality, solidarity and efficiency, will create a comprehensive social security system aimed at guaranteeing the payment of old-age invalidity and survivors' pensions, and covering 51 per cent of the population in the informal sector. Similarly, in the field of health it provides for the creation of health services which will gradually achieve universal coverage.

The reform of our social security system is an urgent response to the aspiration of Colombians to deal with the hazards of life which reduce the standard of living and which limit the possibilities of development.

With humility, but also with determination, I call on capital and labour to work together to build a world of peace, harmony and social security for everyone.

(Mr. Badey takes the chair.)

Original French: Mr. SIDIBE (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Modernization of the Administration, Mali) – It is a great honour for me to speak before this august assembly.

On behalf of my Government, of my delegation and in my own name I would like to join those who have spoken before me to congratulate the President on the occasion of his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am certain that under his clearsighted leadership our work will be crowned with success.

My congratulations also go to the officers of the Conference for the trust which the Conference has placed in them.

Allow me to take this opportunity to thank the Governing Body and Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the exceptional quality of the reports. My Government welcomes the inclusion of the important question of social insurance and social protection on the agenda of this session.

The timely and pertinent Report of the Director-General on this topic raises issues which will have to be dealt with by the International Labour Organization and its member States, whether they are from the north or the south.

An analysis of the document reveals, in addition to observations of the evolution of social protection, external and internal constraints which have a negative impact on it, as well as the need to improve the machinery dealing with this question at a time when the resources available for social protection are becoming increasingly scarce.

I need not remind the meeting that immediately after achieving independence Mali adopted a social welfare code, establishing a system of social protection which is considered one of the best in the subregion.

As regards the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), I would like to point out that the law and regulations in Mali is in line with the principles of the International Labour Organization.

The protection system includes a family benefits scheme, prevention and compensation for occupational accidents and illnesses, health care and old-age insurance.

It deals mainly with workers covered by the Labour Code, but there is a possibility for voluntary insurance for most of the services offered.

Nevertheless, I must note that the achievements of this social protection system are increasingly fading away because of the social cost of the structural adjustment programmes which my country has had to begin.

This is why, aware of the need to implement other forms of social protection taking into account the needs of all of the population, my Government has established a ministry to deal with questions concerning health, solidarity and the elderly. This testifies to our political will to ensure that social protection is part and parcel to economic and social progress.

For instance, we have developed a plan of action in order to establish an institutional and legal environment conducive to the emergence and development of mutual assistance programmes commensurate with the ideals and values of our people.

More specifically, as regards the current social security scheme, the National Social Security Institute has suffered from the backlash of our economic reforms as its funding declined following numerous dismissals of workers.

A drastic recovery plan is now being implemented, and the International Labour Office's support is being requested for an actuarial survey of the institution.

The National Union of Workers of Mali, in light of the very high social cost of structural adjustment programmes, organized an international conference in Bamako from 26 to 28 April 1993 in cooperation with the ICFTU to deal with the social dimension of structural adjustment. The conference was chaired by the Head of State, Mr. Alpha Oumar Konare.

The aim of this conference was to seek consensus at the national level through consultation and dialogue between the main actors in development: trade unions, governments, international financial institutions, the International Labour Organization, and other international organizations. The conference stressed the lack of social protection in existing programmes and recommended that governments make better provisions for social benefits in future reforms.

The delegation of Mali concurs with the point of view set out by the Director-General in Part II of his Report entitled "ILO activities in 1992".

My Government greatly appreciates the efforts deployed by the Organization in its various fields of competence at the level of the member States and invites it to continue on this path in order to foster democratic values, combat poverty and improve social protection of workers.

As for standard-setting, after having presented to the competent national authorities the instruments adopted at the last session, my Government recently submitted to the National Assembly draft laws for the ratification of certain instruments, such as the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), and the Rural Workers' Organizations Convention, 1975 (No. 141).

Most of the provisions of these Conventions have now been included in the new Labour Code.

One of the main missions of the ILO is to develop international labour standards to serve as a guide and reference for member States which wish to improve living and working conditions. It is therefore with considerable interest that our delegation has noted the inclusion on the agenda of the second discussion of the prevention of major industrial accidents and the first discussion of part-time work.

I am certain that the new instruments to be adopted by the Conference on the prevention of major industrial accidents will mark an important stage in the protection of workers, of the population in general and the environment against industrial disasters.

I am also fully aware of the importance of the discussion which is now beginning on part-time work, which is becoming more prevalent in developing countries.

Our legislation has recently taken into account this type of work as part of the general economic environment.

However, despite the possibilities which are offered by this type of work in the present conditions where there are not enough jobs, we must not lose sight of the new and numerous problems which it raises as far as protection of workers is concerned.

The Republic of Mali notes with considerable interest the efforts deployed by the Organization to provide technical cooperation to African countries.

More than ever we consider that the African region must continue to benefit from a larger part of expenses for technical cooperation, not only because of the social dimensions of the economic reform programmes, but also and above all because of the process of democratization which is taking place on our continent.

In this respect, we have noted with satisfaction in the Report of the Director-General the desire on the one hand to increase the volume of resources devoted to the development of institutions and the strengthening of technical capacities of ministries of labour, and, on the other hand, to help workers' and employers' organizations in order to promote their participation as social partners in the overall development process.

My country has hosted a number of high-level ILO missions since embarking on the democratic path, and would like to have these followed up by concrete assistance in the fields of labour, employment, social security and training of supervisory staff.

This would continue the strategy developed by the International Labour Organization to face the new challenges and to promote active partnership to offer improved coverage of the needs of member States and to determine priorities in doing so.

The Government of the Republic of Mali is following with particular attention the evolution of the political and social situation in South Africa.

I would like to take this opportunity to reaffirm my country's strong support for the democratic process taking place as part of the convention for a democratic South Africa (CODESA), which began in December 1991.

We hope that this process, which is a source of hope for millions of South Africans and for all of Africa, will result in the emergence of a democratic South Africa, free from injustice and social discrimination.

I would like to conclude by wishing full success to the work of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' delegate, India) – At the outset I should like, on behalf of Indian employers and on my own behalf, to congratulate the President on the distinction of his election. I am sorry that he is not here. I am equally happy to congratulate both the Vice-Presidents from our social partner groups. I am especially happy that my colleague from Asia, Mr. Tabani, has been chosen as a Vice-President this year. Had time been on my side, I would have had the privilege of speaking when he was in the Chair a few minutes ago. But I am equally happy to speak under our present chairman.

The Director-General is to be congratulated on his very comprehensive Report on the issues facing the world. Several countries, including India, are currently going through a process of structural adjustment. Employers in India, too, find themselves obliged to modernize rapidly and ensure increased productivity in keeping with the existing system and policies. This is a sine qua non if economies are to survive. In the short term, therefore, there may be a slight temporary and selective downturn in employment in the organized sector in traditional labour-intensive enterprises until they are able to reorganize and diversify. It has been our endeavour to undertake such reorganization gently, with a minimum of trauma and in cooperation with our Government and industrial enterprises.

One concern of the social partners has been the protection of workers who face redundancy as a result of the adjustment process. Another issue is the extension of social security to the large informal sector. The main reason for the lack of cover in that sector is the lack of resources. The twin issue, therefore, is that of widening the coverage while generating the resources needed to meet the growing demands on the social security system.

The theme of the Director-General's Report is the affirmation that social security and social protection must be extended to everybody worldwide. A prerequisite of this, however, is the achievement of a sustainable, progressive rate of socio-economic growth on a universal basis. The basic infrastructure for this is missing in almost three-quarters of the world. In the absence of such an infrastructure, the employers would be subject to undue pressure by unions and governments, and it is prima facie unrealistic in the foreseeable future to undertake the task on which the Director-General placed such emphasis. Clarification is also called for on the relative priorities of the two aspects. Obviously, the cart should follow the horse and not vice-versa. We should like to be clear on the Director-General's perspectives in this regard, although apparently the Report itself foresees formidable problems in the pursuit of the objectives which it has outlined.

For our part, we acknowledge our obligation to subscribe to the extended social security system. It must be noted, however, that with a large proportion of the population still deprived of even a modest level of social security cover, medical care and education, it would be dangerous to create islands of assured security amid oceans of poverty, when the great mass of people today are politically aware. We should not maim or kill the goose which can be relied on to lay the golden egg. In the long term, it is only dynamic, sustained overall economic growth and generation of surpluses that can support a viable and effective system of social security. About that there should be no doubt.

Human resources development is also a prerequisite for such stable social and economic growth. The ILO with its experience and expertise is eminently well equipped to coordinate, formulate and implement both country-level and interregional level programmes for human resources development. Human capital formation is one of the most potent factors. A major reason for unemployment among the educated has obviously been the absence of work-related human resources development policies, the lack of linkage between component factors of the social network and the lack of emphasis on work when people are undergoing education. All this has led to a mismatch between the demand for employable persons and the capacity of various subsystems to supply them. A major concern is thus to modernize and upgrade educational and technical training institutions and integrate them effectively, so as to forge links between them and economic activities and enterprises. It will require the creation of close linkages, both at the apex level and in the field, between the world of education and training and that of enterprise, and the ILO has a major contribution to make in this area.

The ILO also has a role to play in rekindling the spirit of enterprise by promoting self-employment. Decades of Fabian socialism have not created the utopia that many of its advocates, and particularly those of my generation, had hoped for. The State, instead of withering away, became all-powerful, oppressive and dictatorial, to everybody's dismay. It also stifled entrepreneurship. Wealth creation can only be initiated by extended entrepreneurship, and an entrepreneurial culture must be promoted in all societies. Indian employers believe that a technical cooperation programme based on the obligation to work could be the most effective tool in this direction. The ILO could design such programmes in its new orientation with larger allocations to its entrepreneurial development wing.

The employer community includes many types of employers worldwide – from multinationals to medium and small enterprises, public or private, and individuals. Within each sector there are differences in corporate structures, managerial qualities and attitudes, and above all, there are cultural and other differences. Our task in mobilizing employers' within our organizations, is therefore no less arduous than that of trade unions and government leaders. Employers' organizations need to be further strengthened. They need to develop their capacity to serve their members in order effectively to play their role in the development process during the coming decades. The Bureau for Employers' Activities of the ILO has provided a very valuable service to our organizations in this area, through its educational programmes and other activities. This has evoked a very positive response from our constituents. Indian employers hope that a high priority will be accorded to this activity in the years to come, in terms of allocation of resources and provision of opportunities.

In reflecting on the potential of tripartism, one cannot overlook the constructive contribution it has made thus far. The concept, born in the aftermath of the First World War, survived the Second. The Philadelphia Declaration gave it fresh impetus in the service of humankind. ILO technical programmes have rekindled the hope and faith of the social partners in mutual dialogue, the only practicable instrument for the resolution of differences and conflicts between groups and society. Barring a few politically committed die-hards, trade union leaders, at least in my country, are understanding and responsive, through dialogue, to the need for adjustment in our country and elsewhere in the world. We have totally rejected an utterly moribund feudalism, orthodox capitalism, dogmatic socialism and bureaucratic communism, and in their place we have together created an awareness-based, liberal, socially oriented, participative and cooperative international system through the ILO, nurtured by succeeding generations of dedicated persons, with continuous dialogue as its main instrument. Notwithstanding occasional disappointments, obstacles and even intransigence, Indian employers are persevering faithfully with the development of the system.

While the ILO can look back on the past 74 years with justifiable pride, it is at a critical crossroad. The fall of totalitarian regimes and dogmatic socialism, the pronounced trend towards democracy and the shift towards market-oriented policies have radically changed our vision of the world of tomorrow. The ILO will have to adjust and respond, both in its perceptions and actions, so as to improve social and living conditions around the world. It should review its structure and mechanisms, and formulate programmes and strategies for the years ahead. Every resource of the Organization should be mobilized in order to promote a dynamic, progressive and productive work culture. Academic talk and rhetoric will no longer do. The main concern of the ILO's constituents today is employment generation, and the ILO must make that its first and absolute priority for an adequate environmental and infrastructural development.

Some of my colleagues have referred to the question of child labour. It is a burning issue. It is of universal relevance and has existed since time immemorial. It cannot therefore be solved with one stroke of the pen. Governments and the ILO are engaged in the search for an enforceable, tenable and socially viable solution after verification in each country and each case. The problems must be analysed on a country-to-country and profession-to-profession basis. The social partners also have to act in a responsible and concerted manner. There can be no short-cuts in solving centuries-old social maladies such as this. All of us, however, have to give a concerted shoulder to the ILO and not force it into uncharted waters where it may find itself lost and out of its depth. Our commitment in this regard is a matter of record.

Finally, every institution has to be reviewed from time to time and re-oriented towards meeting the challenges and concerns of a continuously evolving world. The ILO is no exception. I commend the approach outlined in the proposals for a thorough reform of the ILO sponsored by the International Organisation of Employers, and hope the dialogue on this issue with the Director-General and the executives of the international organizations will be mutually beneficial to all. Employers are committed to this approach.

Mr. BASNET (Workers' delegate, Nepal) – Allow me firstly to congratulate the President, on his unanimous election to the Chair of this august gathering. I extend my warm congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference. I am confident that under their wise and able leadership our deliberations will reach a successful conclusion.

I would like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO and I wish him success in his every efforts in the future.

The Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General are highly commendable and I hope that our deliberations will be useful in solving the problems persisting in our work.

We are deeply concerned with the problem of child labour. This problem exists in situations of high unemployment and underemployment on the one hand, and where a large number of boys and girls are working in miserable economic conditions in factories and industries on the other. To address this problem, we are of the view that institutional and structural change in the economy is necessary. The international community should pay special attention to child labour which is not only a national but an international problem.

I would like to draw attention to our participation at the national level in the tripartite sphere. We have actively participated in the process of enacting new legislation on labour and industry with a view to establishing sound industrial relations in the economy. Consequently, we now have the 1992 Labour Act, the 1992 Trade Union Act and the 1992 Bonus Act. We have high hopes that these texts will promote the welfare of workers and safeguard their rights. We believe that the regulations will be implemented effectively in the interest of the workers.

The process of democratization all over the world has already begun with the dissolution of communism and the emergence of unipolarization in global politics. This process has resulted in the liberalization of the economy of nations. This august gathering should focus on the welfare of mankind and on the vulnerable and weaker elements of society. This is the only way we can deliver social justice and maintain peace and prosperity.

Mr. BROWNE (Secretary of State for Labour, Energy and Power, Sierra Leone) – My delegation brings warm greetings from our Chairman and Head of State, Captain Valentine E.M. Strasser, the NPRC Government and the people of the Republic of Sierra Leone to this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We congratulate very sincerely, the President on his election to the honourable office of the Presidency of this session. My delegation fervently believes that under his dynamic presidency the Conference will achieve its set goals and objectives. My delegation is further convinced that success and effectiveness will be the hallmark of the tenure of his presidency.

My delegation is happy to attend this session of the Conference and we wish to avail ourselves of the singular opportunity to assure the Chair of the unswerving support of our Government for the International Labour Organization. Despite difficult circumstances in Sierra Leone, workers, employers and the Government are indivisibly united in support for the ILO. Hence with renewed vigour and determination, we are very pleased to join the other delegations to this august Conference and to participate actively in its deliberations.

The Director-General's Report on the theme of social insurance and social protection could not have come at a more appropriate time. Whilst the need to extend and improve social security systems and social protection has increased, the resources available for the achievement of such a need continue to diminish. My delegation is very concerned with the following areas which pose serious social economic problems to both the national and international communities.

Unemployment: employment continues to fall below the desired targets, even in the developed nations. Unemployment persists and continues to conspire with other economic factors against the good intentions of economic planning, experts and governments. In Sierra Leone, unemployment continues to increase because of the following causes: the avalanche of school-leavers every year seeking their first full-time job, the ever increasing number of youths both literate and illiterate, the retrenched workers affected by the structural adjustment programme and displaced workers from the war-torn areas.

Poverty: a great part of the developing world is swallowed up by abject poverty. In most of these countries it is very difficult to raise capital for investment because domestic saving is very low or nil. This may be due to the low productivity of labour and the consequent low income. Indeed, low income painfully reflects the low standard of living of workers, coupled with the problem of public debt servicing. In such a situation, prosperity and peace apparently remain an unrealizable dream for the developing countries.

This dismal situation demands a very serious, constant and meaningful dialogue between south and north and south and south.

Imbalances: there are many imbalances in the world today. These imbalances may be referred to as gaps. There is a persistently growing gap between the rich and the poor nations and between the north and the south; there is a growing gap in access to power and opportunity; in educational achievement and in technology. Perhaps the existence of these gaps need not be questioned. What has to be questioned, in my view, is the indifferent attitude towards their existence. The international community is not unmindful of the existence of these gaps but not much is being done towards the closure or narrowing of these gaps. I submit and plead that a mechanism be conceived and put into operation for minimizing these imbalances.

Crisis: the world today is infested with crisis. One only needs to be an avid listener to radio or viewer of television to appreciate the enormity of the problem. On both sides of the Equator and the Greenwich meridian, there are armed conflicts and hostilities, rebel wars, violence and struggles for economic and political power. My delegation urges the United Nations and the regional organizations to step up their efforts to resolve these crisis so as to ensure peaceful and happy environments for workers.

Economic and political mismanagement: this subhead speaks of introspection among nations. I will therefore exercise the necessary caution. We are all aware of economic and political mismanagement and how it often arises where the democratic process has been trifled with and is derailed. In cases such as this political power is denied its smooth flow from one political party to another; it ends in objective and patriotic intervention by the security forces. This is the case in Sierra Leone where we lived with and endured economic and political mismanagement which bred social injustice. We in Sierra Leone are currently carrying out repair work; we need, and request assistance in our efforts at development.

The Sierra Leone scene: I have focused attention on a few of the problems which require the attention of the international community. I now wish to draw your attention briefly to some of our efforts at national reconstruction.

Sierra Leone is plagued with economic, unemployment and poverty problems. The rebel war has compounded our economic and development problems, as it has destroyed the valuable areas from which we derive our diamonds, gold and agricultural products.

Despite this ugly situation our Government has come out with realistic action programmes to grapple with these problems. There is an ongoing youth mobilization programme; there is a programme for rural development; a programme for road development; a programme for reconstructing the administrative, economic and educational infrastructure; a programme for national health and sanitation whereby a national cleaning day – the last Saturday in the month – is observed and there is a programme for national financial discipline, especially in revenue collection and expenditure control.

I am pleased to say that the ILO has been one of our partners in development and reconstruction. The ILO is with us in the programme for labour intensive rural work and construction and the rehabilitation of roads in some parts of the country. The ILO is tirelessly training our departmental personnel and has gone a long way to assist us in modernizing our labour laws. In brief, our Government is devoted to the building of a new society in Sierra Leone based on social justice, upholding human dignity and equal access to opportunity, transparency, accountability, efficiency and responsibility in government.

In conclusion, it only remains for me to thank the Director-General for his usual excellent Report meticulously prepared for this session of the Conference.

Original Farsi: Mr. AFKHAMI (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the Employers' delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election. I would also like to express appreciation to the Director-General for submitting his valuable and thought-provoking Report on Social insurance and social protection to the present session of the Conference.

Recent developments in the world have always been an issue of paramount importance for ILO member States as well as for the Employers' and Workers' groups. A cursory glance at the proceedings of the previous sessions of the Conferences is indicative of the timely and appropriate measures often taken by the ILO in the face of the aforementioned developments. But what should be the ILO's reaction against the developments of the coming century? Shall we expect the same pattern of market distribution between the economic superpowers, as we saw within the last few decades of the twentieth century, or might we experience a new pattern characterized by very tough competition among the newly established economic powers, who are now at the forefront of the latest technological breakthroughs?

At present, the technological and scientific gap between the developing and industrialized countries is so wide that it cannot possibly be bridged in the near future. What would then be the perspective of the former group of countries in a century of the most dreadful economic competition, the first century of the third millenium?

Along with the ever-increasing technological gap between the two groups, the once well-established economic definitions such as "rich" and "poor" have also undergone rather fundamental changes. Countries possessing a large amount of natural resources may no longer be considered "rich" merely because of their material wealth. On the other hand, countries which are deprived of natural resources may not be labelled "poor". One of the new yardsticks against which "poor" and "rich" might be measured is the degree of technological advancement.

I would not wish to go into lengthy elaboration of other facets of the world economy in the last decade of the present century. My concern as an employer representative, however, is the aftermath of structural adjustment policies in the developing countries, and in the countries which after long and successive years of planned economy, are now taking their first steps towards market-oriented economy. Transition to the private sectors of the centralized power once monopolized by government will undoubtedly bring about a series of unfavourable consequences which should be duly considered beforehand by the ILO, governments, workers and employers, as well as other social partners.

One of the best-known means to cope with the undesirable side-effects of the transition period and structural adjustments, i.e. unemployment, high rate of inflation, low wages, etc., is social security systems. Such systems, however, may also be closely affected by the profound changes of structural adjustment and the unprecedented events occurring in the world.

The collapse of the stock market in 1929, the oil shocks of the 1970s and the recent disorder in financial markets are good examples of such events. In each of the above-mentioned cases, lack of appropriate social security systems brought many inconveniences for governments, employers and workers. The countries which enjoyed a sound social security system, however, managed to tackle successfully the dire consequences of these events.

Our world calls for more attention to the rapid establishment and expansion of existing social security networks, now more than ever before. Governments should extend full support to these networks, which may otherwise be dismantled in unfavourable economic and social conditions, as has been the case with a good number of industries and financial institutions such as banks, pension funds or social insurances within the past few years. Withdrawing government support will surely lead to a feeling of insecurity and uncertainty on the part of employers over their investments and it will also cause serious problems for workers as well as for other social beneficiaries.

The Director-General of the ILO thoroughly exhausted the issues of structural adjustment and human resources development during the last session of the Conference. In doing so, he has already paved the way for a new study on the application of management techniques for social security systems.

According to the Report of the Director-General, the administration of a social security scheme is usually the responsibility of an autonomous social security institution or of a government department. As the experience of the developed countries has shown, the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all individuals and households enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and accept change and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability.

The construction and, in many cases, the reconstruction of systems of government-sponsored social protection at a level consistent with the current state of development of the countries concerned is clearly one of the major tasks of economic development for the next several decades.

Access to social security and social insurance, as duly emphasized by the Director-General, is a basic human right and a measure of human welfare. Therefore, its promotion (which tends to be excessively expensive) will require normative action on the part of governments, social partners and the ILO. Technical assistance concerning the structure and development of the schemes will be also required. The latter, an enormous task, requires more attention from the ILO in the unfavourable economic situation of the world.

On behalf of the employers of the Islamic Republic of Iran I wish to assure the present session of the Conference that we shall closely follow the deliberations on the main features of social security programmes and their administration and we shall fully participate in their follow up. Let me end my statement with my best wishes for the success of the present session of the Conference and for its fruitful results.

May God Almighty guide us all to the right path of salvation.

Mr. ANTONIOU (Workers' delegate, Cyprus) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Cyprus, I would like first of all to join with the previous speakers in extending to the President and the Vice-Presidents our good wishes and congratulations upon their election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like also to express my appreciation for the reports presented by the Governing Body and the Director-General to this Conference.

All the items on the agenda for the current session are very topical and relevant within the framework of the difficulties confronting the people, and particularly the working class.

I wish to make particular reference to several significant questions raised in the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection.

The Report mentions three main constraints, and proposes strategies to get around these constraints. Such strategies are aiming at expanding the framework offered by structures of formal employment; improving the administrative, financial and managerial efficiency of social security systems; and promoting a greater commitment to solidarity between the different social and economic classes so as to help the systems of social protection of developing countries to move towards the objectives of international Conventions and Recommendations.

I fully endorse the proposed strategies, but at the same time I would like to focus on the question of old-age pensions and provide some information on how things developed in Cyprus. Like in many other countries, in Cyprus also there appear some trends that run counter to each other.

For some years now the trade union movement in Cyprus has been insisting on the reduction of the pensionable age for female employees and for all those employed in arduous and unhealthy occupations. Specifically, while the pensionable age for all workers is 65, we are demanding that for the above-mentioned categories it be reduced to 60 years of age.

At the same time, some other categories expressed the wish not only to preserve the age of 65, but even to increase it under certain conditions. As is known, average life expectancy has a tendency to increase gradually. Thus, it is obvious that the reduction of the pensionable age and the increase in life expectancy lead to a substantial increase in the cost of financing social insurance schemes.

Through these contradictory yet interdependent trends, we were led to a settlement which is based on the flexibility of the system.

Therefore, through the mechanism of tripartite cooperation we have come to the following arrangement: while the age of 65 remains as the pensionable age, workers may choose to retire at 63.

Those who choose not to retire at 63 are entitled to delay their pension until the age of 68; for every year of postponement their pension is increased by approximately 7.5 per cent. Furthermore, as regards invalidity pensions, the qualifications were relaxed; a worker who is over 60 years old is entitled to invalidity pension even if the rate of his invalidity is 50 per cent; the corresponding rate of invalidity for workers under 60 is 67 per cent.

We believe that such a system will benefit workers who objectively cannot continue their work after 63; at the same time it will give sufficient encouragement to all those who wish and have the capacity to continue working up to the age of 68. In addition, this system helps to overcome the difficulty related to questions of equality between men and women workers that may result from a lower pensionable age for female workers only.

Surely, at this moment, we are not in a position to estimate the concrete results of this practice, since the entire system was put into operation just a few months ago. However, we shall observe it not only to find out its practical results, but also to make any necessary corrections as weaknesses appear.

It goes without saying that these modifications bring about an additional financial cost of about 1.5 per cent of labour costs.

Speaking of social insurance, certainly one of the main problems is the viability of these schemes. The viability of such schemes depends of course on securing a balance between income and expenditures in such a way that the financial burden for the maintenance of these schemes does not accumulate and get transferred to future generations.

It is perhaps useful to make reference also to the coverage of the scheme. Our scheme, which is based on tripartite contributions, i.e. 6.3 per cent by the employees, 6.3 per cent by the employers and 4 per cent by the Government, is compulsorily not only for employees but also for the self-employed. Since the income of the self-employed cannot be verified as easily as that of employees, the bulk of their contribution is calculated on a notional revenue which basically does not correspond to their real revenue.

This is one of the major weaknesses of the scheme and is considered to leave employees at a disadvantage.

Certainly, this problem cannot be solved by excluding the self-employed from the scheme; that would constitute an anti-social measure. The solution may lie in measures that will ensure that the average contributions of the self-employed are not lower than those of employees.

However, taking into account the concept that social security has to expand further so as to encompass a framework of social protection providing basic social support for all citizens, the States have to undertake the responsibility for financing a substantial part of the schemes.

Acknowledging that in several countries – in particular countries in transition and developing nations – stabilization and structural adjustment programmes have aggravated problems such as high unemployment, poverty, low incomes and the reduction in spending on social programmes, the International Labour Organization should continue and expand its programme of activity to promote nationwide systems of social protection.

I would like to conclude by expressing my conviction that this session of the Conference will contribute significantly towards the tackling of these serious problems which are before us.

Original Russian: Mr. GONTCHARIK (Workers' delegate, Belarus) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election and I wish him and his Officers every success in their work.

We must do our utmost so that the present session of the Conference is as successful as possible.

The question under discussion today is particularly important for us. We support the main points set out in Mr. Hansenne's Report. The Report is indeed a good basis for our discussion and I hope that it will bring results.

Social protection must be an integral part of general social and economic development. The level of provision is presumably the best indicator of a mature and democratic society and State. Without it human rights and social justice remain but empty words.

For the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus, in a country which is trying to become an independent and democratic State, the transition to a market economy is a very important and complex problem. We have to work in conditions of economic crisis and inflation. The volume of our industrial and agricultural production, national income and, of course, consumption have all declined. The structural adjustment of our economy has resulted in jobs being lost. There is a growing disparity in incomes, a concomitant increase in crime and a moral decline.

All this, of course, creates a social tension.

The trade unions which are also in the process of reform are working towards the solution of all these interrelated problems, which lies in minimizing the losses and costs inherent in the transition to a market economy and reorganizing the system of social protection. Trade unions have an important role to play.

We assume that mass unemployment is socially dangerous for a young State such as our Republic. We must do everything in our power to prevent overt and hidden unemployment exceeding the socially acceptable level.

Unfortunately, more than 1 per cent of the economically active population today have already entered the legal category of unemployed persons. Amongst them, young people and women are on the increase.

To create new, and preserve existing jobs, is the best social protection we can try to provide to those who can work. We must also bear in mind that the population is neither materially nor morally ready to face job losses. This is why we do not support the overzealous attempts of the Government to solve the problem by leaps and bounds without taking account of reality. We believe that there can be a transitional period. Legislation and policies must be based on real situations.

How do we intend to tackle the problem of social protection? Firstly, we must develop the economy and various forms of private ownership, and a socially oriented economy. We do not want welfare dependence but a motivation to work. That is our approach.

This is why training and retraining skilled and unskilled workers is so important.

We are grateful to the International Labour Organization for aiding us in this important task, and we hope that cooperation will be strengthened and go beyond merely seminars. In this respect we would welcome the creation of a regional centre for the countries of the CIS, in Minsk, for example.

Secondly, there is also an obvious need to strengthen the legal basis for social protection so that it may truly reflect the needs of various groups of the population, and the economic potential. The system must be effective and socially just. With this in mind, our federation of trade unions plays an active role in drafting new laws to deal with the problem, including the preparation of a new Constitution for the Republic.

Thirdly, while working to preserve stability and peace in our Republic, we are pursuing a policy of social partnership on a tripartite basis. Many problems of social protection are solved in the course of negotiations with the government and employers' organizations, during tripartite consultations, and in collective, wage and general agreements. We learn how to listen and put our point across because this is the only way to find a correct solution. It is not simple. Sometimes we have to be harsh when people misunderstand us. For instance, at the beginning of the year our Federation strongly protested against the Government's attempt to strengthen employers' rights to lock out workers. To its credit the Government had the courage to admit its mistake and to correct it.

Fourthly, one of the most important bases for social protection is the protection of an economically and socially justified minimum wage. This approach is also important because pensions and benefits are calculated on the basis of minimum wage.

The Government has undertaken not to allow prices to exceed income by more than 30 per cent this year. This is set out in general agreement.

Fifthly, as you know, my Government has suffered greatly from the Chernobyl accident. Mitigating the effects of the accident and particularly protecting the health of the population is an integral part of a social protection system as a whole. The problem is, of course, very topical and recent studies have indicated that, unfortunately, the health of the population is worsening, and particularly that of children. This is why our trade unions have undertaken to work towards improving the health of the population. With their help, over the past year more than a million people have been given the chance to rest and to take cures in sanatoria.

We are sincerely grateful to all those who have helped our Republic, who welcomed our children for holidays and provided medicine. In particular, I should like to highlight the understanding and support given by trade unions in the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Denmark, Russia, Ukraine and Moldova, as well as public organizations in Germany. This once again shows that solidarity among workers are not just empty words.

The transition to a market economy changes the role to be played by trade unions. Our trade unions will no longer carry out government functions, in terms of labour protection and the management of social insurance. Decisions to this effect have already been adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Republic. We support the creation of a special fund for social protection as an independent financial credit organization, and we reserve for our Federation the right to sit on the boards of that organization so that there be public control over expenditure on social insurance. Our immutable goal is concern for workers.

Thus, it is obvious that the problem under discussion is urgent, and I am convinced that a society can only be called just if it can provide opportunities for work and due renumeration for those who can work and earn their own living, and if it helps those who no longer are not yet able to do so.

The International Labour Organization has a historical role to play in solving this humanitarian problem.

Original Russian: Mr. STOYANE (Workers' delegate, Ukraine) First of all I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on having been elected to these very important posts, and I would like to wish them success in directing the work of the conference.

On the agenda of the present session we have a very important and topical question. The readiness of any State to perfect its society in the interests of its people may be judged by that State's programme of activities in the social sphere. An effective social protection system is an integral and inseparable part of a civilized society.

The Report of the Director-General quite rightly notes that "countries engaged in . . . transition must urgently develop a safety net which provides at least a minimum household income for those below the poverty line".

Today in Ukraine we have observed an ever-growing gap between the cost of living and the incomes of the majority of the population. One can say that the prices of consumer goods and foodstuffs have reached the level of those in the market economy countries, while wages have remained at the level of countries with centrally planned economies. Even according to approximate calculations, we find that more than half of the population is living below the established minimum level. Our society is increasingly threatened by a split between those involved in material production, with extremely low incomes, and those who are exploiting the situation, making money in activities completely unrelated to the creation of wealth. The situation is further exacerbated by the fact that many of those employed in production do not get their lot. Hidden unemployment has reached significant levels. Almost 60 per cent of all workers in enterprises surveyed by the unions have been placed on forced leave, and consequently do not work full days or full weeks. More than 44 per cent of the workers have been sent on forced leave without pay.

In the circumstances the Federation of Ukrainian Trade Unions has paid particular attention to the improvement of legislation concerning employment. It was thus possible for us to defend a number of vital provisions during the drafting and revision of the Employment Act, which was adopted by the Supreme Soviet at the end of last year. In particular, we were able to defeat attempts to reduce existing guarantees for the social protection of dismissed workers and the unemployed. Under the trade unions' proposal enterprises creating new jobs are to be given economic incentives. An agreement was reached with the Government regarding a special state programme to promote youth employment for the next two years.

We understand that the young Ukrainian State does not have bags of gold with which to finance social programmes during the transition to a market economy. Social protection measures have to be elaborated within the framework of tight budgetary restrictions. We also understand that economic stabilization is not possible without stabilizing the social situation and the creation of a national consensus in the country. That is why the Federation of Ukrainian Trade Unions was among the first to come out for the establishment of a tripartite national social partnership council which is to work towards the prevention of social disputes.

This council includes, along with the leaders of our federation (which is considered the most representative and which has a membership of 20 million), other Ukrainian trade union representatives as well. This made it possible for us to establish constructive cooperation with all trade union organizations when we were working on and concluding the general wage agreement. There are currently more than ten such organizations in Ukraine.

I share the view of Mr. Hansenne regarding the fact that during the transition to a free market and competition there is nothing more important for the ILO than to demonstrate the importance of protecting workers. This subject is particularly topical for many countries, and for Ukraine in particular. The main objective of social protection must consist in creating conditions whereby people can help themselves. But the more vulnerable groups – the elderly, the handicapped or disabled, and unskilled workers – cannot fend for themselves, and must be guaranteed certain standards of social protection.

On this assumption, the Trade Unions Federation helped formulate a state convention on social security for the Ukrainian population. In general, social security, in our country should be based on a set of complementary organizational and statutory provisions including: compulsory social insurance (against unemployment and industrial accidents) and health and life insurance; state social protection; social assistance and care; additional voluntary social insurance and social welfare.

Setting up a modern, effective system of social protection is an extremely complex business, particularly when the entire system of economic and social relations is being restructured. That is why we are counting on the ILO's assistance, because it has at its disposal qualified experts and experience in the operation of various types of social security systems.

The Ukraine is part of an interdependent world. We all face the same problem – how to reconcile the natural aspiration to attain material well-being with the desire to preserve social justice. The solution to this problem can be effective only where there is coordinated cooperation between the social partners at both national and international levels.

Mr. HENDY (representative of the International Centre for Trade Union Rights (ICTUR)) – There have been many changes in the world over the last very few years. For all the crowing in the West about a new world order, it appears to me that the situation of working people throughout the world has generally got worse, not better. Now the Deputy Assistant Commissioner of the metropolitan police in London tells our citizens that within five years criminals from Eastern Europe will take over the supply of drugs and guns from the triads, mafia and Columbian cartels working in Britain. Crime, unregulated by laws and taxes, is of course the purest form of free enterprise. Perhaps we should be grateful that Eastern Europe has adopted the free market with such fervour. For all that, we are told today that capitalism and the market economy is not merely the best but the only way to a better life. The current world recession is a precise refutation of that assertion.

The recession in the world today is plainly the product of the market economy. It is directly responsible for the worsening of the conditions of life of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of millions of people all over the world. There can be no doubt about it, the world is locked in a vicious cycle of boom and slump, as indeed capitalism has been for at least 200 years. But there is now no easy excuse such as unexpected bad weather producing a bad grain harvest to explain away the present slump. Slump is simply an unalterable characteristic of the dominant market economy. There is no prospect of the cycle being controlled or even alleviated under the world market economy.

Working people, retired people, unemployed people and their children have, therefore, no prospect of the market improving the condition of their lives. Their only hope is in their own efforts. Those efforts can only be effective if organized and united. They can only be effective through trade unionism. Sidney and Beatrice Webb in their seminal The history of trade unionism published 100 years ago said: "A trade union, as we understand the term, is a continuous association of wage earners for the purpose of maintaining or improving the condition of their working lives." They could have added: "and hence of their lives generally".

The reality is that today it is only trade unions which can maintain or improve the condition of the working lives of the working people of the world. Millions of people throughout the world recognize this. That is why in Britain, even after 14 years of government attack and anti-union legislation, more people belong to trade unions than any other organization. More belong to unions than all the political parties put together. More belong to unions than all the churches, mosques, temples and synagogues put together. More belong to unions than all the football clubs, fishing clubs and all the sports clubs in the country put together.

Yet loyalty to trade unions is under increasing attack. The understanding of working people that trade unions "advance and maintain the condition of their working lives" is shared by the employers. And they do not like it. It stands in their way. It stands in the way of the free market. Whilst for the employers "freedom to compete means freedom to combine", they cannot tolerate that maxim applying to labour and so the dominance of the market has everywhere led to an increasing onslaught on trade unionism ranging from propaganda to murder.

For as the free market has become the economic system for most of the world, it has not been content to impose local market economies in which the local population can exercise local control. On the contrary, it has utilized technology to globalize the market and any attempt at local control is regarded as anathema. Vast transnational corporations run by a managerial élite who owe allegiance to no-one but their inhuman corporate shareholders make decisions based solely on the best economic interest of their corporations, regardless of the interests of their employees, still less of the local populations where they open and close their enterprises.

The people of the new democracies can exercise their votes in the certain knowledge that vital decisions about whether they work or become unemployed will be taken not by their elected representatives but by directors in some foreign boardroom.

The market as a determinant of the condition of people's working lives is the very antithesis of democracy. Control is exercised not by people who are elected by the community or even by the consumers, still less by the workers. Control is exercised by the nominees of institutional owners, who in turn are controlled by other nominees of other institutional owners. Such is their power that they wrest from public ownership and democratic control the enterprises owned by the citizens and privatize them for private benefit.

This is what our Government in the United Kingdom has done with our gas industry, our water industry, our shipbuilding industry, our telecommunications industry and as a favour to the multinational oil corporations and despite throwing tens of thousands of British workers into permanent unemployment, our coal industry is first raped, then to be privatized, and with it our railways.

In the developing countries the transnationals are at their most unrestrained. They are assisted by the IMF with its structural adjustment programmes. In their quest for lower labour costs, the attack on trade unions, on trade unionism and on trade unionists is likewise the most savage, the most violent. In the developed countries, the greater the commitment of governments to the free market, the greater the attack on trade union rights and freedoms. Were it not for the mutual interest of European producers in preventing each other from undercutting their production costs and maintaining a population with the wherewithal to consume European production, the almost empty social chapter of the Maastricht Treaty would be long gone. As it is my country has exempted its employers and, indeed, foreign employers in Britain from even those minimal standards.

All over the world in the quest for reduced labour costs, the principles of freedom of association enshrined in international labour Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 are being violated by employers and with the active support of governments who pretend to adhere to those Conventions.

In such a world the ILO is a bastion of freedom and fair play. Its Conventions and standards are one of the few restraints to arbitrary power of the free market in labour. Armed with the objective standards of the ILO, international trade unionism can counter the organized gangsterism of the transnational corporations. Notwithstanding the transnational corporations' operation of the sinister, powerful and ruthless cartels committed to methodically exploiting a global market to drive down production and, in particular, labour costs, trade unions will resist. They will resist despite the legal and violent restraints placed on their activities to protect working people.

If the ILO will continue to advance and maintain trade union and employment rights, the trade unions can continue to advance and maintain the conditions of the working lives of their members.

In this, the International Center for Trade Union Rights will assist, to the best of its ability, both the ILO and all free trade unions.

The International Center for Trade Union Rights thanks the ILO for the admission to its ranks granted in March. It congratulates the Director-General on his Report and the President of this session of the Conference on his election to the Chair.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – According to the Standing Orders of the Conference the right of reply for three minutes is being given to the representative of Iraq, Mr. Said.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The representative of the Kuwaiti regime said in his statement at this session that there are Kuwaiti prisoners of war in Iraq. We would like to affirm to this august body that what the representative of the Kuwaiti regime has said is not true. There are no Kuwaiti detainees in Iraq. The Red Cross, the United Nations and regional organizations have verified these claims and declared there are no Kuwaiti detainees in Iraq.

The raising of this subject by the representative of the Kuwaiti regime in international forums perpetuates the unjust embargo imposed against Iraq and prevents Iraq from satisfying its basic needs, such as food and medication, and exposes the Iraqi people to disease and sickness, leads to the shutting down of factories and exposes workers to unemployment. Those political aims and vested interests pursued by the representative of the Kuwaiti regime in our forum is a flagrant violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, international conventions and treaties and the United Nations Charter. Those principles provide for lifting the embargo and freeing the frozen assets of the Iraqi people, especially as Iraq has complied with United Nations resolutions.

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR. CARLOS S. MENEM, PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Your Excellency President Carlos Menem, allow me on behalf of the distinguished delegates of the Conference and on my own behalf to welcome you to this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference – that is to say an international parliamentary assembly grouping representatives of governments, employers and workers from 165 States. Your visit is proof of the high status of Argentina and a tribute to your own personal qualities, Sir.

There is no need for me to dwell at length on your prestigious past, but I am honoured and privileged to introduce Mr. Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference, in order to deliver a message of welcome.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr. President of the Argentine Republic, it is a great privilege for the International Labour Organization to welcome you today as a guest of honour of our Conference. I am convinced that the message you are bringing will be a source of inspiration for us all, allowing us to share the experience of a country which has succeeded, not without difficulty, in reconciling the modernization of its economy with respect for democratic values.

Mr. Carlos Saúl Menem, who is honouring us today with his presence, has always been an ardent defender of democracy. His first cause on graduating as a lawyer from the University of Córdoba was to defend the political prisoners detained after the fall of the Justicialist Government in 1955. Arrested as an opponent of the military regime which took power in 1976, he spent five years in different prisons in Argentina and only regained his freedom in 1981.

After holding office as Governor of the Province of La Rioja for a number of years, he was elected President of the Argentine Republic in 1989.

His country has been engaged on the path of democracy for close on a decade and it is only four years since it was in the throes of one of the most serious economic crises of the century, with three-digit monthly inflation rates and daily demonstrations against food shortages.

But a process of positive change is now under way in Argentina after a difficult period of austerity and sacrifice and periods of tension and discord. The effort involved has been considerable but it is now beginning to bear fruit. Inflation last year was only 18 per cent, the peso has stabilized, the GDP has increased by more than 8 per cent for two years running, while the rise in unemployment and the decline in remuneration are slowing down.

The next task is to underpin this change for the better and to further consolidate democracy through dialogue and equal participation by all sectors of society in the benefits of growth.

Mr. President of the Argentine Republic, I am sure that the employers', workers' and Government delegates of the 165 ILO member States represented here are impatient to hear your message.

Original Spanish: Mr. MENEM (President of the Argentine Republic) – Mr. President of the International Labour Conference, ladies and gentlemen. We are extremely pleased to have been invited to take part in this session of the International Labour Conference. It is an honour and a tribute to our people, and our country, and its definitive restoration of democracy, freedom, production and labour and an unconditional respect for human rights. You should know that only a few days ago we were commended by the Organization of American States through its Commission on Human Rights. Many Argentine citizens have been claiming damages for the harm they suffered during the years of persecution, imprisonment and torture, from 1976 to 1983. The Argentine courts and the previous Government rejected their claims on the grounds that these claims were barred by the statute of limitations. Even the Supreme Court rejected these claims. But that was not right; it was not fair. Beyond the written law there is natural law, and the right of any person to seek damages for harm or injury done to him or her due to abnormal circumstances such as those which existed in the Argentine Republic. Therefore, we reached agreement with the victims. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the Organization of American States and the Government over which I preside resolved to pay the damages claimed by these Argentinian citizens who had been imprisoned, persecuted and tortured. A few days ago we were commended by the Organization of American States for our unconditional defence of human rights.

Next year the International Labour Organization will celebrate its 75th anniversary. It is the only agency of the United Nations system which was able to bridge the ideological and political abyss which led to the holocaust of the Second World War, because its main objectives have always been the search for social justice and the harmonious participation of the social partners.

Tripartism – the joint efforts of workers, employers and the government – is the major contribution of the ILO to the international community.

Today we have a planetary civilization. The instantaneous and simultaneous character of events foreseen by Heidegger almost 60 years ago is now a tangible reality. Communication is the rule, thanks to the mass media. What started in Guttenberg has taken on planetary proportions. A single televised image of a killing in Bosnia, for instance, or of famine in some other country, makes us witnesses to events which may be far away in spatial terms, but which become our intimate responsibility.

The President of the Argentine people brings today a very warm greeting to the authorities of the ILO and to the representatives of governments, employers' and workers' organizations. But he wishes also to speak of the efforts made by a people which is shaking off decades of atavism to face the challenge of history.

We witness, astonished, a series of changes which constitute major historical trends, including the collapse of the bipolar world of the Cold War, and the consequent emergence of a multilateral world, the integration of great economic areas, regional integration, and the success of the market economy. This worldwide "reorganization" involves a genuine social process in which old, rigid mechanisms are altered by new economic circumstances which rapidly affect the relations between capital and labour. In so doing, these circumstances modify the machinery of coexistence itself.

This change is not casual but logical. It reflects the exhaustion of a rigid model which began in previous decades with the rise in the price of oil and in the prices of raw materials and of certain agricultural products. Those price rises were warnings. We cannot possibly hope for an indefinite expansion of the productive capacity of our economies and of the level of consumption of our peoples in a world of finite natural resources. That is the situation which gave rise to the international debate on what is referred to as the "limits of growth". It is as if between the 1970s and the 1980s a break occurred in the industrial model, as the process of economic growth based on mass production for large-scale consumption finally ran dry. The institutional framework of that model or system contained rigidities which prevented employment from adjusting to changing circumstances.

Imagination, adaptability and agility are the qualities the social partners must have if they are to survive in the new world economic order. Indeed, I should say the new economic, political and social order. Those are the qualities which can ensure that enterprises are able to meet the challenge of competition. Small and medium-sized undertakings play a major role in the creation of wealth and of employment. Enterprises and even countries which cannot innovate are condemned to perish. The dynamism required by political and economic change has not always been reflected in labour market regulation. The instruments on which countries relied to prevent social imbalance could become very regressive in times of crisis. The inconsistency between the new economic and social reality and outdated legal systems pointed clearly to excessive government protection of employment. Where no adjustment occurred, those excessively protective standards were finally overwhelmed by clandestine employment which prevented improvements in economic efficiency and productivity.

From that dysfunctional situation, a new integrating culture is now emerging, based on the ideals of social justice, solidarity, the opening of frontiers, and the free circulation of goods and persons. Over the last 20 years we can identify two processes whereby economic and social relations are being integrated and internationalized. One tends towards the integration of specific sectors of economic activity without any geographical limitation. The other tends towards a more complete articulation of economic activities in specific geographical units.

These new processes of integration are now preempting the old debates on different models of development, and raising new, timely and urgent questions. There is, for instance, the matter of national macroeconomic policies and how they are affected by capital which moves rapidly from one market to another in search for maximum profitability.

One of the great challenges of today is how to deal with the need for productive investment in national economies, and the constant movement of capital. That situation has led to a series of protectionist policies in the major countries which account for the evident institutionalization of subsidies which discriminate against our workers and producers. The resulting restriction on our exports has hurt our economies and distorted our labour market.

If our region is to continue to enjoy democracy, and if its inhabitants are fully to enjoy human rights and fundamental freedoms, it is necessary for our economies to share in the process of globalization, but that must be done with equity – and the same rules must apply to all. In Argentina, our policy aims at the inclusion of our country in the international scene, and at the required structural changes to revitalize an economy which has suffered from constant and persistent inflation.

Our hyperinflation led us dangerously close to social disintegration. Economic crises and technological changes gave rise to conflicting pressures. It was necessary to fight unemployment, to reduce inflation and to create new jobs. An additional challenge was the need to protect the unemployed and all those engaged in non-standard forms of employment. In Argentina, since our administration has been in power, 752,000 new urban jobs have been created, and we have introduced an unemployment insurance scheme. As His Holiness Pope John Paul II said in the Encyclical Laborem Exercens, "the obligation to provide unemployment benefits, that is to say, the duty to make suitable grants indispensable for the subsistence of unemployed workers and their families, is a duty springing from the fundamental principle of the moral order in this sphere, namely the principle of the common use of goods or, to put it in another and still simpler way, the right to life and subsistence".

We suffered from what was not only an economic but also a social and cultural situation in which a privilege-dispensing, oversized and overgenerous State stifled private initiative and the creation of wealth. Society was helpless in the hands of a State that gradually consumed its best resources. Such was the situation which faced us when we took over the constitutional government of our country. We were facing a real crisis of principle. It was necessary to seek imaginative, flexible and efficient machinery through which the community itself could bring about change, aided by an effective State, which would perfect the system of cooperation and share responsibilities with the social partners, who would truly assume them. On the other hand, the State had to resume the initiative, propose a programme and timetable, and foster discussion within society to achieve the necessary consensus for generating the specific instruments which would enable us to overcome the crisis. This functional responsibility was crystallized in various initiatives in both the economic and social fields. We wanted to carry forward a structural transformation which would make economic stability possible, and establish rules for the world of labour, by concentrating on a set of bills respecting the reform of the State and the administrative emergency. In addition of stability, the scheme was supplemented by a convertibility plan, the object of which measure is to reorganize the economy, to privatize services, to set up an economic policy which would generate a sound currency of permanent value, reduce inflation drastically and open up our economy to those processes of overall integration which are developing at the world level.

In the social field my Government's objective is to give society the basic tools to create the conditions required for greater productive employment. All this we intend to do while safeguarding the values of our own employment system and the guiding principles of the International Labour Organization.

In synthesis, our economy has significantly raised the level of its integration into world markets. One single comparison will confirm the truth of our repeated declarations to that effect. In 1974, our exports plus our imports amounted to 17 per cent of the GDP. Today, the proportion is 22.3 per cent, and we are certain that this will rise even higher. But it is not only the level of integration but also the level of competitivity of our economy which has increased. A large part of our production is now competitive on all the world's major markets.

In the particular field for which the ILO is responsible, we are initiating a process towards reducing unemployment and devising an incomes policy compatible with an economic policy which will permit the investment of fresh amounts of capital. The first instruments in this process were the National Employment Act, the Occupational Accidents Act and the Decree on Productivity. If we agree that the percentage of active workers is an indicator of economic power and social equity, we must conclude that this percentage must be increased to satisfy our aspirations for sustained economic growth as the basis for a more equitable society. The creation of employment in a market economy depends on the level of production. Genuine new employment can be generated only by an increase in production.

However, although it is also true that our GDP has increased by around 9 per cent, employment has risen by only 2.5 per cent.

Thus one of the challenges facing the modernization of labour relations is to improve the performance of employment when production is increasing. For the above reasons, we are engaged in a profound transformation of the whole of our labour legislation particularly as regards incomes policy, reform of the benefits system, the modernization of labour relations and vocational training. The main objective of this transformation process is to create the conditions under which internal and external investment will become attractive.

Such conditions must permit new jobs to be created and the competitive strength of our economy to be improved. No one can fail to appreciate that this objective is the only real way to improve the living conditions and incomes of our working people.

In the incomes policy sphere, we have made collective bargaining the main component of our labour relations model because we believe that it is capable of solving most of the problems posed by salaried employment.

During the next few days we will be establising for the first time a National Joint Committee of State Workers, under legislation which on the proposal of the executive has been approved by Parliament.

As regards the reform of the social insurance system, we are very close to effecting a profound transformation of a system which, despite the changes introduced over the last 15 years, is now bankrupt. The deficit, if it had been maintained, would have amounted in the year 2000 to some 6 billion pesos or dollars every year, an amount close to 70 per cent of our economy's average wage. Under the new legislation the State will administer employers' contributions while those of the workers will be the responsibility of the pensions and benefits administration funds.

The central feature of our reform of benefits is to be found in a combination of the principles of saving and investment. Savings are represented by the contributions managed by the administrators of the funds, which will be transformed into a genuine source of capital investment and thus help create employment for all the workers.

Our draft legislation to modernize labour relations opens up the way to a discussion of employment policy in the light of the considerations which I have expressed. It calls for an attitude of toleration and mutual assistance on the part of all agents and negotiators, whom I invite here and now to abandon attempts at confrontation and to go all out for cooperation which must be the true spirit underlying the new rules of the game.

The overall reform which we propose seeks to bring the statutory regulation of employment into line with modern times. This reform must be directed towards job creation and reconversion. I might sum up by saying that the proposed transformation of Argentinian employment legislation aims at establishing a statutory framework which will help create employment, and increase economic and labour productivity.

The conditions exist in the Republic for this and for facilitating the efficient management of human resources and meeting the demand for adaptability which are a feature of the new productive economic order, and which will enable workers' incomes to be increased.

It is also our goal to strengthen collective bargaining, and to reserve basic rights for protection by the State. It is important to strengthen the functions of the trade unions and the representative organizations of the employers.

Our aim is to establish a new balance between the social partners. We are not trying to reduce workers' rights within the undertaking, but to establish a clear basis for discussion which will make it possible for employers' rights and responsibilities to be compatible with those of the workers.

In substance, increasing the productivity of Argentinian labour is a national aspiration to which this proposal gives form. This objective can be achieved only through vocational training.

I should like to recall the words of the man who was three times President of Argentina, a constitutional President, a great politician, a great statesman and a great general, Juan Domingo Perón. He said some 20 years ago that we live in an age of specialization at all levels of human activity. He who is not prepared to develop is faced with a choice of two paths: that of renunciation, which will make him a non-productive creature sapping the strength of the society which raised him; and that of study, which prepares the individual to face the responsibilities of his post. And General Perón concluded by saying that our young people must acquire the necessary knowledge and training so that in due course they may occupy with advantage the higher specialized posts which our economy requires.

Today that is what we are trying to do in the Republic of Argentina.

Today we have conferred on vocational training the character of a right enjoyed by the workers. But it is also a duty, so that employment can be given real stability.

I should like to conclude by stating that the Government over which I preside does not seek to manage the crisis but rather to overcome it, a crisis which has for years affected our country. With that object in mind we have taken the initiative and are exercising our functional responsibility as governors of the country. We have launched a debate so that our fellow citizens – the true protagonists of change – may assume responsibility for a democratic transformation, in freedom and pluralism, towards a competitive social organization totally freed from regulation by the State. That is, in our judgement, the right way to be followed in offering our people, and all peoples of the world, as far as we can, the benefits of peace, work and development. These benefits will carry us inexorably forward to a great, just and sovereign Republic. These are the objectives we have set ourselves. We want to make our Argentina great. We want to make our people happy, democratic and free, enjoying growth, development, justice and peace.

God bless you.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Your Excellency, I have the honour and the pleasure to join in the warm welcome that the delegates have extended to you. This welcome, on the part of this assembly representing the governments, workers and employers of 165 countries, is proof of the eminent status that both you and your country, Argentina, enjoy on the international scene.

I shall not dwell on your prestigious background, which the Secretary-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, has already described. I should merely like to emphasize your efforts on behalf of the workers of your country.

Mr. Menem, your visit holds special meaning for us given your impressive qualities and those of the Argentine Republic. Since your election in 1989, you have worked for a renewal of your country, and it will be no exaggeration if I say that your liberal economic policies have begun to bear fruit. It is enough to refer to the impresssive performance of the Argentine economy, whose growth has averaged 5 per cent per year, as a result of which the Argentine people can now look forward to the future with confidence and hope. It goes without saying that such an achievement has not been without its problems, but we are sure that you will overcome them.

As for your personal qualities, they are an example for us all. You represent a society that believes in openness, democracy and respect for human rights. The Argentine Republic has been a crucible which, throughout its history, has assimilated many cultures and set an example of social tolerance. We are also following with great interest your efforts to enhance economic cooperation with your neighbours and we wish you every success in these endeavours.

Mr. President, I cannot conclude without referring again to your personal qualities since I had the honour to escort you during your visit to Egypt and came to know and appreciate your modesty and dislike of formality. You are at ease with ordinary people, and a keen football fan, all of which testifies to your popularity as a leader who is loved by his people.

Mr. President, allow me to extend to you and to the Argentine Republic my very best wishes.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.45 a.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA) – We shall now resume the discussion on the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body.

Original Spanish: Mr. ROZENTAL (Government delegate, Mexico) – My delegation would like first of all to wish every success to the President and other Officers of the Conference in carrying out the programme of work of this session of the Conference.

Since Mexico joined the International Labour Organization in 1931, it has entered unequivocally into the commitments of and associated itself with the objectives of the ILO. Fourteen years before that, my country was the first to enshrine social rights in its Constitution. The ILO, for its part, has been campaigning since 1919 for the adoption, at the international level, of standards which recognize the basic rights of the workers. Both of us in our respective spheres have consequently been fighting to achieve what the Preamble to the ILO Constitution states as the objective of the Organization – social justice.

Mexico is aware of the importance and significance of the standards adopted by the ILO. It has ratified 74 international Conventions prepared under the auspices of the Organization, and has played an active role on its main bodies. Mexico has been honoured to chair the Governing Body this year – for the fifth time since the end of the Second World War. This has reaffirmed our determined commitment to uphold the work of the ILO which observes the fundamental aim of obtaining the best living and working conditions for workers, and thereby promote social justice. In Mexico, as in the ILO, tripartism is one of the fundamental pillars of government action taken with regard to labour matters.

I have pleasure in announcing that on this occasion of my attendance at this Conference I shall be handing over to Mr. Hansenne the instrument by virtue of which the Government of Mexico has ratified the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172).

Few periods in the history of mankind have seen so many important changes in such a short space of time. Periods of economic expansion without precedent have been followed by periods of recession with negative consequences, mainly for the workers. During the past decade, Mexico has been faced with a difficult economic situation with reduced growth, high inflation and the erosion of general standards of living for the population. Since coming to power, President Carlos Salinas has decided to face up to this challenge by modernizing our economy from top to bottom and putting public finances on a sounder footing. It is particularly important to combat inflation to ensure an equal distribution of income and wealth and because of the harmful effect it has on the economy.

I am pleased to inform you that we have met the challenge of achieving sustained growth with stable prices through a successful policy of social consultation.

Since the end of 1987 Mexico has concluded three social agreements. With the first agreement, on economic solidarity, we sought to minimize the social cost involved in the implementation of a plan for economic stabilization and in combating inflation. The agreement regarding stability and economic growth included the aim of ensuring stable and lasting economic growth.

The current agreement concerning stability, competitiveness and employment combines the macro-economic and micro-economic objectives, especially as concerns productivity in enterprises which is of fundamental importance to consolidate the fight against inflation and the creation of more and better jobs.

The North American Free Trade Treaty (NAFTA), which has now entered the final approval stage will create new sources of employment and stimulate the training of more Mexicans. Mexico does not base its development strategy on cheap manpower. The NAFTA agreement and the parallel agreement now being negotiated, by providing for increased productivity and more training for workers, will lead to better standards of living and social welfare for all.

It has not escaped our attention that the necessary restructuring of economies and the search for new horizons has also led to fundamental changes affecting a growing number of workers in all sectors of the economy. The modernization of market economies of necessity involves a social cost. Structural changes have to be accompanied therefore by social measures for the different sectors of society which are suffering the most from structural changes.

The most significant and most difficult process now under way in Mexico concerns the fight against poverty. A modern vision of national sovereignty also presupposes the ability of the State to integrate the most needy people in the process of production, and improve their well-being.

We have to reaffirm the principles which gave rise to the ILO and the commitments assumed by member States for the improvement of the living and working conditions of their population. The ILO must continue to play a predominant role in the search for ways and means of achieving a balance between economic efficiency and social justice in accordance with its original mandate.

The Mexican Government has read with great interest the Report of the Director-General on Social insurance and social protection. We believe that it should lead to a consensus on the function of governments and the social partners in regard to the adaption of social security and protection systems to the processes of structural adjustment. We reaffirm our support for the maintenance of the basic principles of social security, namely solidarity, redistribution, equity, universality, efficiency and opportunity. Tripartism is also one of the pillars of our social security system in which the State, employers and workers play an equal part.

We are aware that in all parts of the world there is an intensified search for new and more advanced levels of protection and social security. And this has led us to review our functions and responsibilities in the different sectors, reflecting a broader concept of social protection.

From the point of view of Mexico, the State cannot evade its fundamental responsibility for ordering and guaranteeing a social security system. The State will continue to be the only factor for striking a balance and guaranteeing adequate protection of the resources which serve to meet the needs of the population in the field of social security and protection.

This does not do away with the need to seek new approaches, which, on the basis of community structures and collective solidarity, will make it possible to meet the growing needs for better health services, social protection, housing and education. The fulfilment of this aim will mean a better distribution of the national product.

Mexico has undertaken a vast programme which, while respecting the traditional social security institutions – the Mexican Security Institute and the Social Security and Welfare Institute for Public Service Employees and the Health Service – is seeking to meet the most pressing needs of the population.

Thus, on the basis of the idea of shared responsibility and collective solidarity, we have launched a national solidarity programme. This programme, together with the traditional social systems, is making it possible to provide services and meet the needs of 30 million Mexicans.

The basis for this programme lies in the responsibility shared between the State and the efforts that must be made by communities on the basis of the minimal resources that they have at their disposal, in order to do away with bureaucracy and increase efficiency and flexibility in the allocation and use of resources. This has made it possible within a space of 40 months to provide drinking water to 11 million Mexicans, electricity to 13 million and legal protection for ownership to 1.5 million Mexicans.

There are no universally applicable models to meet the serious problem of unemployment resulting from structural adjustment: the solutions lie in specific economic, social and political features of each country. The ILO can collaborate in this task.

In my country there are 85 million Mexicans, and every year 1 million more people come on to the labour market. This increase calls for new and creative solutions. The national solidarity programme has resulted in a large number of self-ger ating employment opportunities. The creation new employment, by whatever mechanism is p posed, implies of course that the labour force m be qualified or better qualified to meet the dema of technological advance which are prevailing in production process.

For this purpose, it is necessary to make for provision for the setting up of vocational train schemes.

Finally, I would like to tell you that we h

The new labour policy introduced by the pres
Government has established a framework for s taining economic development with social justice. To this end, we are taking the necessary steps to establish a Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare as the appropriate authority to integrate and regulate the major labour administration services, such as for employment creation, skill development, social security and labour protection.

While on the subject of workers' protection and safety, we would like to bring to your attention the May 1993 fire accident in a large toy factory in our country which resulted in a significant loss of workers' lives. The factory, which produced stuffed toy animals and plastic dolls, had previously been inspected by labour safety officers from the central and provincial labour offices and was warned to ensure safe working conditions. After the tragic incident, the Prime Minister, the Interior Minister, heads of political parties and authorized officers immediately visited the factory and took action to render all possible assistance to the workers. The Department of Labour Protection and Welfare of the Ministry of Interior came to an understanding with the toy factory employers according to which they were to assist all their workers in this case and in future cases of death, injury and sickness and re-employment where necessary. The employers have responded wholeheartedly and with a sense of responsibility. The Department of Police is still pursuing an investigation of the accident to ascertain the actual cause. We shall continue to keep the workers' safety programme in the forefront of our activities.

We are happy to note that after a period of six years the role of the ILO in technical cooperation is again being discussed at this session. Also, the Director-General's Report deals with development of a system of social security and social protection and the role of the ILO in improving their effectiveness.

The technical cooperation priorities set by the ILO in some areas may not suit the socio-economic conditions of some member States. We hope that the Director-General will scrutinize them in detail before taking a decision, particularly for the Asia and Pacific region. We note with concern that there was a significant decline in the number of new projects in the first six months of 1992. We regret that the ILO's labour and population team for Asia and the Pacific ceased to exist in 1992. We are apprehensive about the impact of the ensuing closures of ARTEP, ARPLA and APSDEP, as they may lead to a further drop in technical cooperation projects. The thematic approach covers areas such as support for democratization, an area for which concrete technical assistance projects have not yet been clearly defined or devised. Besides, it appears that the ILO depends mainly on the UNDP for technical cooperation funds. We wonder whether such funds are likely to be available for technical assistance programmes in support of democratization. In Asian countries the need is not so critical for supporting democratization, as democracy has already taken root in the majority of them. It is vital to focus on specific areas such as technology transfer, employment promotion, the development of human resources, skill development and safety. I hope the Director-General's office will be able to pay greater attention to the priority needs of member countries and assist them in devising appropriate social policies to sustain a higher rate of economic growth.

We welcome the discussion on the Convention concerning part-time work. We would, however, like to emphasize the need for specific schemes that facilitate access to part-time work for the unemployed. These can be promoted by the ILO as part of its technical cooperation activities.

We have also responded to the Report prepared by the Director-General's Office containing the proposed Convention and Recommendation on the prevention of industrial disasters. This is also an area where technical assistance activities should be focused.

Thailand agrees that the existing Conventions on labour standards should be reviewed and updated to enable flexible implementation in developing countries. It is always more realistic to support member States in complying with the Conventions than to stress strict enforcement in the early stages, because developing countries face many international trade problems. Some of these problems are created by allegations of violations of human rights or workers' rights. Thailand, as a founding member of the ILO, has been supporting the ILO's regional projects by hosting several of them. We will be glad to continue such support. We hope that the ILO will devote more of its financial and staff resources to the field offices for technical cooperation activities, not only for policy advice but also to assist in implementing the policy according to the Director-General's Report. Since only a small proportion of the ILO budget is devoted to technical cooperation, this deserves special attention for review at this Conference.

I would like to thank you and all the delegates for your attention and wish you every success in achieving the objectives of the Conference.

Mr. BHUIYAN (Minister for Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – I should like to ask the President to accept our sincere congratulations on his well-deserved election to the leadership of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that his wisdom and experience will lead us towards very successful deliberations and important decisions. Our congratulations are also extended to the distinguished Vice-Presidents on their election.

The Director-General should be congratulated on his richly deserved re-election for a second term of office. We hope and believe that during the second term he will excel even beyond the high level of performance demonstrated during his first term. Bangladesh will continue to support him and encourage him in paying particular attention to the special problems of the least developed countries.

The Director-General deserves thanks and appreciation for his excellent Report. We have found it very informative and thought-provoking. The least developed countries who are members of the ILO would appreciate it if the future reports of the Director-General could focus more sharply on the specific problems and difficulties of the LDCs in the field of labour. This would also be in keeping with the decision of the United Nations General Assembly requesting the specialized agencies to pay particular attention to the problems and needs of the LDCs.

The issues of social insurance and social protection have assumed greater significance in recent years, especially in the context of renewed emphasis on structural adjustment. I compliment the Director-General for focusing on such an important issue in his Report. Bangladesh believes that the socio-political sustainability of economic development needs much greater attention than it has so far been given. The issue of structural adjustment cannot be viewed in isolation. The social and political dimensions, particularly those involving productivity, welfare and security of workers will have to be taken adequately into account. We appreciate that the Director-General has drawn our attention to this major issue in his useful Report.

Since the different regions of the world are at different stages of economic development, the concept of social insurance and social protection will need to be articulated in the context of the economic capacity and dynamics of a given society and state. Despite political will and even commitment, many of the least developed countries face serious economic difficulties in relation to the adoption of institutionalized and formal social insurance and social protection of workers. In most of the developing societies the family is still the foundation of social insurance and social protection. Higher levels of external technical assistance and economic support are essential if the most disadvantaged countries are to move towards an institutionalized system of social insurance and social protection. Mere discussions are meaningless if these words are not matched with additional external resources and better democratic participation at the national level to achieve these social targets.

The pace and dimension of the structural adjustment programmes envisaged by multilateral financial institutions need to take into account fully the wider aspects of the political sustainability and social sustainability of the structural adjustment initiatives, which cannot be an end in themselves. The Government of Prime Minister Khaleda Zia is fully involved in the challenge of harmonizing the needs of structural adjustments with the imperatives of employment generation, education, medical care and old-age pensions, etc. Our Government is particularly attentive to the need of employment generation in the rural areas of Bangladesh. We believe it is the key to social insurance and social protection.

Some highly innovative and successful Bangladeshi NGOs are doing pioneering work in the field of rural employment generation and social insurance and social protection in Bangladesh. Their significant contributions towards the poverty alleviation programme of our Government is widely appreciated. The partnership between Bangladeshi NGOs and the Government is becoming more substantial and meaningful as democratic institutions and political freedom continue to flourish in our country.

Trade is the most potent source of employment generation. Progress towards democracy, development and employment generation do suffer if fair trading opportunities cannot be created, especially for the most disadvantaged countries. The successful and balanced conclusion of the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations will be a significant step towards free trade and employment generation.

Prime Minister Khaleda Zia has made "Dal Bhat" (a basic minimum food programme) the cornerstone of the socio-economic policy of her Government. The momentum of democracy in Bangladesh is very closely linked with the programme of poverty alleviation and protection of workers' rights. I myself, having been a trade unionist during the early days of my political career, can appreciate very well the need for protecting the rights of workers in Bangladesh. Our Government is politically committed to addressing these basic human issues in a comprehensive framework of democracy, development and human rights.

A tripartite consultative committee has been established in Bangladesh under the chairmanship of the Minister for Labour and Manpower. This is the first time that such a progressive and enlightened forum has been activated to integrate our working population in a responsible and transparent dialogue with the Government and the employers. We are also pursuing a comprehensive programme of updating, harmonizing and rationalizing our laws relating to workers, working conditions and the trade union movement. Our Labour Laws Commission comprises representatives of all three partners.

There is growing concern in Bangladesh about the tendency to draw the ILO into a political debate on the issues of human rights. Our Organization is a specialized agency devoted to serve the workers. Increasing politicization of the objectives or activities of the ILO would be, in our view, detrimental to the interests of the Organization. The institutions of the ILO system need to remain within the mandate of the Constitution of the Organization.

The reporting obligations under the Conventions ratified by Bangladesh place an enormous burden on our extremely limited resources. Those in the ILO who process these reports may need to take into consideration our special problems. Sometimes, the line between help and harassment can be quite thin. It is very important to have our priorities right or else we may stray away from the primary objectives of the ILO.

Our growing democratic experience, the freedom of the trade union movement and the free press are among the advantages which we have in making a meaningful contribution as a member of the Governing Body of the ILO. The balanced and constructive foreign policy of Bangladesh is the basis of our cooperation with the world community. Bangladesh is looking forward to making its modest contribution to the important activities of the Governing Body of the ILO.

Finally I would like to reiterate that Bangladesh remains fully committed to the principles and purposes of the ILO.

Original French: Mrs. DE VITS (Workers' delegate, Belgium) – The Director-General's Report describes the features of a social insurance system as it was introduced in the immediate post-war period in the countries of western, eastern and central Europe. Those features were: cover for all citizens, funding based on solidarity by all according to income, and guaranteed benefits in case of need. These are the three universal features which should be generally guaranteed by legislation, and it is through legislation that the State, the main player in the system, safeguards the three universal features which characterize a social insurance system. Seen in this light, the global situation described in the Director-General's Report is not encouraging, and I would like to put forward a number of possible reasons for this. As I have already said, I take the universal nature of an insurance system as a measure of its quality. In the light of this, we can discern two realities and two major trends. The first reality is that only a very small proportion of the world's population benefits or has benefited from a universal insurance system. I refer here to the populations of a few western and eastern European countries and Canada. The second reality is that, where there is no universal insurance system, the conditions needed for setting up such a system do not as a rule exist. The first major trend is that States with a universal system are tending to depart from it as a result of restrictive social policies. The second trend is that States with only a partial insurance system are also tending to depart from the principle of universality rather than drawing closer to it, and thus tend to have fewer contributors, fewer risks covered by the system and fewer beneficiaries. So, on the one hand, the international community as a whole is departing from the principle of universality, while the poorest States seem to have neither the means nor, on occasions, the political will to create the conditions needed to put the principle of universality into practice. Universality remains, for many countries, an ideal which is impossible to attain, at least in the medium term. It is different for European countries which have elaborated systems of social protection which aim to approach as closely as possible the concept of universality. Systems of social protection have thus been set up gradually. They are the result of social struggle and the gains made by workers since the end of the last century. While there are significant differences in the actual implementation of the systems, there are a sufficient number of points in common for us to be able to talk about a European model of social protection, whereby Europe differs from the United States or Japan in having compulsory systems which aim to protect the whole populace from the main social risks. Nevertheless, this European model of social protection has been under attack for a number of years. Values of solidarity and universality have been called into question. Thus, especially since the early 1980s, social protection systems have been subjected to repeated attacks on various pretexts based on financial, demographic and also ideological constraints. Certain conservative circles are trying quietly to undermine solidarity among workers and to put the philosophy of individualism – of "each for himself" – in its place. European systems of social protection are thus departing more and more from the principle of universality.

The same trend is evident in the countries of eastern Europe. The development of uncontrolled capitalism has created pressures to reduce social security and protection measures which have already been introduced. Western European countries are also experiencing a certain regressive trend. The phenomenon of social marginalization, which is closely connected with employment problems and with the increase in long-term unemployment, has become a major problem. An ever growing number of citizens and workers are falling through the social protection net and into this descending spiral of marginalization. The mechanisms for funding the system are going through the same crisis as a result in particular of an increasingly ageing population, the growing imbalance between working and non-working populations, and the financial disengagement on the part of State. This phenomenon is particularly conspicuous when one considers the dynamic force of the European construction process which was launched more than 30 years ago. If social cohesion really is one of the objectives which the European Community had set itself, the logic which has underlain all the stages of this European construction process has always been dominated by an economic and fiscal vision.

The establishment of the Economic and Monetary Union confirms this state of affairs. The criteria for convergence envisaged in the Treaty of Maastricht are also used as genuine instruments of fiscal policy and serve as the pretext for setting in motion a wave of social devaluation measures and attempts to undercut social costs. Even if a new approach to social protection must be considered, it must not be at the cost of the European social culture which is an important asset in our countries. Even if this culture has to be adapted, it must not be sacrificed on the altar of fiscal policy.

The dominant feature of social insurance systems in developing countries is their limited scope. They are reserved for civil servants and the staff of a small number of large enterprises. Moreover, even within these groups contributions are not necessarily related to income. The risks covered are also limited. The system meets only a small portion of the needs of its few beneficiaries.

When an insurance scheme falls so short of universality, it increases social inequality rather than helping to redress it. Should these countries therefore rely on charitable bodies for social protection? How can the situation be improved for the greatest number of people? What action can be taken against poverty? As they are based to a large extent on workers' contributions, social insurance schemes depend, on the one hand, on formal contract-based work relations and, on the other, on the existence of a stable wage-earning population. These conditions are very difficult to encounter in developing countries.

A very large proportion of the labour market is based on informal relations and wage-earners themselves move repeatedly from the formal to the informal sectors and vice versa throughout their career. They do not join a formal wage-earning structure for life.

Given the scale of informal labour relations and of the interrelationship between the formal and informal sectors, some countries opt for development of the informal sector in order to ensure a minimum income for the population. It follows that social protection in such cases is oriented towards informal labour, provision of drainage systems for shanty towns, access to basic education for children.

These social protection programmes are very important for their beneficiaries but their impact is too limited. Informal employment sectors and the protection given them in some cases may be sufficient to meet individual needs but they do not satisfy community needs for employment. Programmes for dealing with poverty at the local level are obviously necessary but they do not relieve the State of its duty to play a role through economic and social policy.

This also applies to a number of international institutions, in particular the IMF and the World Bank. As far as the role of the State is concerned, I feel it should do everything it can to develop formal labour relations. It is not a matter of attacking informal work or doing away with the few scraps of protection available to workers in the so-called informal sectors, but every effort must be made to provide favourable conditions for the development of formal labour relations.

The first condition involves the pursuit of policies designed to stabilize the situation of workers and wage-earners. Stable conditions for workers is an essential prerequisite for developing formal labour relations. It is not simply a matter of social security but rather of security as such. The State must provide for the security of its citizens and there can be no stability for workers while death squads continue to exist. The first form of universality for which the State must work is the security of all its citizens, first and foremost the poorest among them. It must therefore shoulder its responsibility for protecting its citizens against violence and against this background give priority to the right to housing. In a situation where social benefits are constantly dwindling, the status of citizenship must at least be stabilized, primarily by providing access to housing.

The second condition is universality of taxation. For as long as multinationals base their decisions on whether to invest in a State on the extent to which that State has been deprived of its fiscal prerogatives and to which the local work force may be exploited in defiance of ILO Conventions, it will be very difficult to lay the foundations, in terms of wages and salaries, for a universal insurance scheme.

That brings me to the third and last condition, which is recognition of the independent economic and social decision-making power of States. In conclusion, I believe it is now generally recognized that the main value of a social insurance system is its universality because it can thereby lay the basis for solidarity. This universality is directly linked to the enlargement of the wage-earning work force and hence to employment on the basis of formal work relationships. It should then be a matter of international consensus that every State has the right to the minimum material preconditions for establishing universality in its priority areas of responsibility: the physical protection of all its citizens; the provision of stable conditions for the wage-earning population, primarily in terms of housing; the levying of sufficient taxes; ensuring equality for all citizens and all companies as taxpayers; and the financing of social policies, at least in the fields of education and health. Unless States recognize the need to address these priority tasks on behalf of all their citizens, I cannot see how it is possible to set up a social security system that does not lead to growing inequality among the people of a country. Agreement must first be reached on the universal need to address these tasks democratically in all States. The technocrats who specialize in turning out indicators must defer to the political will of governments. This applies both to the international community and to Europe.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA) – I would like to remind speakers that they are only allowed ten minutes.

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Secretary of Labor and Employment, Philippines) – I should like to join those who have addressed this Conference before me in congratulating the President as well as his Vice-Presidents on their election. My delegation and I shall extend the fullest support to them. Given the wisdom and experience that each one brings to this Conference, we are confident that the discussions will lead to very meaningful results.

May I also, on behalf of myself and my delegation, extend our warmest congratulations to Mr. Hansenne, whose able stewardship of the ILO has propelled him to a second term as Director-General – a second term that shall be marked by a committed drive for the ILO to become an important player in the shaping of social development in a fast-changing world.

I also welcome the new member States who have recently joined the ILO, the Organization that continues to house and nurture the sum of all our national lives that stand committed to the reshaping of a better future for the world's millions of workers and their families.

Last year my country successfully and peacefully elected a new President under a democratic Government brought in by the February 1986 revolution. During the first six years much effort was focused in strengthening the democratic institutions of the country. Today, Philippine democracy provides a strong basis for the economic liberation that we sorely need to provide a better life for our people.

The Philippine economy is now being nursed back to health. Our efforts at stabilization, restructuring and reform over the last years are starting to bear fruit. But we shall need to continue to be a country under structural adjustment programmes if we wish to address the many problems that keep many of our people in poverty.

Our vision for the new century is to bring our economy to industrial status. Our medium term development plan for 1993-1998 has taken up the twin themes of "global excellence" and "people empowerment". Export orientation and other trade and fiscal policies are adopted to enlarge the so-called "economic pie". People empowerment shall both help enlarge the pie and divide it more equitably.

How then do we venture to compete in a tough and even competitive world? The programme calls for civil order and political stability, a deeply ingrained work ethic, and a commitment by the political and economic elite to the common good. The strategies include commitment to a free market economy, giving our people a stake in development, industrializing from a base of agricultural productivity, developing an educated and highly skilled workforce, the fostering of export industries, and the building up of a solid infrastructure.

Important focus is now given to measures that will correct the dysfunctions in the labour sector, the dismal state of technical and vocational education, and retraining schemes. An invigorated economy needs not only capital and infrastructure but also an excellent workforce of world-class skills.

The strategy also departs from the "trickle down" policies of the past, which had only left our farmers and other poor communities behind, and moves into a policy of what we call "positive discrimination". Pro-poor programmes are in place.

Our Government is committed to upholding the basic rights of workers to self-organization, collective bargaining and negotiations, and the right to strike and peaceful concerted action. In the same way that we have liberalized foreign investment laws, as we develop our regional growth centres and industrial estates, workers' rights shall continue to be upheld.

To bargain away these basic rights as a premium for economic growth would go against the very grain of political empowerment and the constitutional mandate that guarantees and protects their free and responsible exercise.

Our strategy to create more job opportunities and attract both domestic and foreign investments will miserably fail, however, if there is chaos and anarchy at the workplace. We are, however, today experiencing an unprecedented level of industrial peace. The number of strikes has gone down from the 500 or so per year of five years ago to only about 160 strikes last year. We expect the number to go down this year.

Requests for preventive mediation rather than strike notices have increased, signalling that a new relationship between labour and management is already in order. Regional as well as national social accords between employers and labour organizations, increasing access to voluntary modes of dispute settlement and increasing use of dialogue have brought relative peace to the workplace.

The Labour Code of the Philippines is today undergoing a tripartite review to make its provisions responsive to the changing order. Amendments will be submitted to Congress, when its sessions resume in July of this year, for the necessary legislation.

The Director-General's Report on Social insurance and social protection comes at a very critical time, when the world as well as each individual member country is in search of creative strategies to provide more from dwindling resources for a growing number of people. For countries like mine, the experiences of the developed countries have shown that the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all persons and households strengthens the labour force, enhances its capacity to promote growth and absorb change, and contributes to the build-up of social and, ultimately, political stability.

As the Director-General has wisely observed in his Report, social protection in developing countries like mine must be integrated as part of a general socio-economic development, in order that it may be extended to the whole population, and contribute to, as well as benefit from, the other aspects of development.

The task is not impossible. But it is formidable.

Under the leadership of our President, Fidel Ramos, our vision and strategy to reach higher socio-economic growth as contained in the "Philippines 2000" programme consist of a parallel upgrading of social protection not only in terms of benefits but also in terms of coverage of population. The present system is presently being studied to provide a greater level of support for the poor, for those whose participation in and benefit from the mainstream of economic activity have been minimal.

Our Philippine Congress last year enacted a law that brought our agricultural workers and some segments of our informal sector under voluntary coverage by our social security system. This has brought the majority, as well as the more disadvantaged sector, of our labour force within the mantle of social protection.

Four international labour Conventions on social security involving migrant workers, Conventions Nos. 19, 118, 157 and 165 have also been submitted by the President to our Philippine Senate for ratification. The migration of more than a million Filipino workers to other countries makes it mandatory for the mantle of protection to be extended to wherever they are, in collaboration with and with the cooperation of the host countries.

We shall not wait for the year 2000, when we will have achieved considerable economic growth and the "economic pie" will have expanded to allow it: poverty must be alleviated as soon as modest amounts of growth are achieved. Social protection programmes must be formulated to reinforce other anti-poverty measures, not on humanitarian grounds, but because the major contributors to growth in my country are these very same sectors.

Part-time employment is an increasing trend in our country. But in the case of a developing economy such as ours, part-time work is mostly involuntary. While we welcome this development as a boost to employment creation, it may also promote underemployment. We will need to monitor closely the growth of this phenomenon, and ensure that the workers are provided with protection under this scheme. The ILO programme on this matter should be intensified – to identify trends, and to look for possible remedies in the context of the larger socio-economic situation of each member State.

Our Government is fully supportive of the proposed adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on the prevention of industrial accidents. We must, especially for both importers and exporters of hazardous substances and technologies, ensure the protection of our workers, the community, and the environment.

The active partnership policy for technical cooperation merits our full support. The multidisciplinary teams, one of which will be set up in Manila, should enhance the ILO's technical capacity to render its operations more constituent-led, demand-driven, relevant and, of course, cost-effective.

The Director-General states in his Report, and I quote "the ILO cannot act alone". The internal reforms in the ILO as well as the commitment of its members to be a significant part of the world's economic mainstream should enable us, individually and collectively, to respond effectively to the changing relationships in the world economic order and to ensure that we not only protect our workers but also enhance their capabilities for growth and development.

As the ILO strengthens its capacity to participate actively in this endeavour, much assistance should also be extended to the social partners in each member State to enhance their own capabilities in the national as well as regional debates in pursuit of the delicate balance that must be achieved between economic efficiency and social justice.

If we are to win the future for ourselves and our children as well, we must find the will and the energy to ensure greater policy and programme cohesion between labour and economic, social and political development.

Mr. JAYASINGUE (Government delegate, Sri Lanka) – On behalf of the Sri Lankan delegation, I would like to begin by extending our heartiest congratulations and warm wishes to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as President of the Conference. We also extend our courtesies to the respective Vice-Presidents who have been elected. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr Michel Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-

General for a second term of office. We hope that his second term will be of particular benefit to developing countries.

I bring to this august assembly warm wishes and felicitations from the new President of Sri Lanka, His Excellency, D. B. Wijetunge, who many of you might remember, addressed the 79th Session of the Conference last year as Minister of Labour. He was, at that time, also the Prime Minister. Even as President, he retains the portfolio of labour.

The Director-General has prepared for this Conference an excellent Report, Social insurance and social protection. I have read this report very carefully and I must compliment the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for such a thought-provoking and analytical presentation. There are also specific items listed on the agenda for discussion which include the important subject of the prevention of industrial accidents and a new subject, namely part-time work.

The prevention of industrial accidents, although an old subject, has assumed special importance especially in our region. The region will, no doubt, be a crucial arena for future global industrial growth. My own country, Sri Lanka, has already become a dynamic industrial growth centre in the region. Sri Lanka's educated and skilled workforce and the stable and liberal business climate have attracted many multinational companies seeking to establish industries. In terms of turnover and workforce, Sri Lanka has, perhaps, the largest free trade zone in the world. All this means the intrusion of new industrial technology. Industrial plants, machinery and industrial chemicals, however, bring the bad with the good – the bad being industrial hazards. With the massive influx of modern industry into our region comes the need for regular training of the workforce in how to handle machinery and chemicals. This responsibility has not yet been sufficiently met in the region.

The other subject on the agenda, that of part-time employment, does not have the same immediate relevance to countries in the region. In our part of the world, the formal sector is very limited and we certainly do not have full employment. However, I would like to show my appreciation to the ILO for having included the subject, as even to our region it may be relevant in the future. The peculiarities of the definition and scope of part-time employment will make standard-setting a challenging task indeed.

I would like to comment a little more fully on the theme of the Director-General's Report. The subject of social security for workers and their families is indeed very topical today. Approaches to the problem of social security have evolved steadily over the last several decades.

To begin with there were insurance schemes which provided for retirement benefits, survivors' benefits, benefits in case of injury at work, etc. The basis of this approach was the pooling of risks across a contributing population – voluntary at first, compulsory later. These schemes were typically fully-funded and self-financing ones relating to individual accounts. The State played little or no role in them. The coverage of the population and the coverage of benefits was therefore very limited. On the other hand, today in industrialized countries we see the emergence of a broad spectrum of social protection across the whole community.

These schemes are wide enough to include unemployment benefit. Security is provided to the whole population on the basis of need, and not only to contributors on the basis of their contribution and employment history.

Obviously, this advanced stage of social protection found in industrialized countries is not found in developing countries. To workers and their families in many of these developing countries protection against even elementary work-related hazards remain yet a dream.

My country, Sri Lanka, ranks quite highly in terms of social welfare and the quality of life of its people. We have a compulsory Employees' Provident Fund Scheme and an Employees' Trust Fund Scheme guaranteeing retirement benefits for employees in the private sector. We also have compulsory compensation schemes for occupational injuries and diseases. In addition, public servants in Sri Lanka enjoy a state-financed pension scheme, a survivors' benefit scheme and a limited medical insurance scheme. All citizens in Sri Lanka enjoy free education up to university level. They also enjoy free medical care.

As you can see, Sri Lanka has historically adopted a rather bold approach in trying to emulate the advanced social protection programmes prevalent in industrialized countries.

However, Sri Lanka has come up against the brick wall of national income realities. Attempts to expand universal social protection schemes have been reflected in growing national budget deficits. In 1991 Sri Lanka's public expenditure was 32 per cent of its gross domestic product. Each time this ratio goes up the Government must either borrow more or tax more. Excessive borrowing would lead to macroeconomic imbalances. On the other hand, excessive increases in taxation would result in disincentives for investment. This is a dilemma. And therefore Sri Lanka has had to cut its coat according to its cloth. Attempts at universal schemes providing health and education cover, set against limited national income growth and limited tax-based incomes, inevitably result in the lowering of standards of delivery of such services, constraints on benefit cover and restrictions on distribution. The imbalances of supply and demand – supply here meaning "supply of resources" – can only be reconciled by administrative rationing and queuing at the services' point of delivery.

The hard reality is that any broad form of institutionalized social security going beyond the restricted systems of traditional social insurance would have to depend primarily on economic growth. I am glad that this issue has been raised in the Director-General's Report because it serves to underline the need for the ILO to establish a formal nexus with international development agencies. In fact, this morning His Excellency Mr. Carlos Menem, President of the Argentine Republic, made the same point.

Historically, the ILO has been perceived as a standard-setting body. The passing of resolutions, Recommendations and Conventions would be merely ritualistic if such instruments could not be implemented by the majority of the world's people. Records show that many ILO Conventions have not been ratified by many Members. The ILO should therefore reorient its strategy by actively establishing links with international development efforts designed to ensure balanced economic growth among all nations. Let us hope the Director-General's Report will be a turning point.

I should like to emphasize a particular point here, namely the need for some reasonable correlation between economic growth and the expansion of social protection measures for the worker and his family. There are some who argue that social protection should come only after economic growth has been achieved. These persons have got the wrong end of the stick. Social protection should not be a secondary activity – it should be a concomitant activity. For one thing, business growth presupposes a contented workforce. We have examples of successful economies where miraculous growth took place against a background of employee-oriented managerial practices: Germany with its co-determination, Japan with its employment for life, and so many other examples of industrialized countries which have been successful. The social protection of the worker is therefore not a secondary consideration but a priority on a par with economic growth. It encourages growth and should therefore, in turn, be a result of it. This, however, does not discount the moral argument for social protection and there is also the compelling consideration that social protection measures are a sine qua non for social stability.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the ILO headquarters and the ILO Office in Colombo for all their hard and splendid work on behalf of Sri Lanka.

Mr. QUINN (Minister for Enterprise and Employment, Ireland) – Let me say at the outset that I would like to associate my delegation, the Irish delegation, with the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents for their successful elections at this Conference.

Ireland has been proud to be a part of the International Labour Organization's long and distinguished history. I warmly welcome the publication of the Director-General's most recent report, Social insurance and social protection. Informative and comprehensive, the Report is also provocative in that it clearly identifies the challenges which the Welfare State faces as we advance towards the twenty-first century.

These challenges consist of major structural and demographic changes within all our societies. In addition, the collapse of communism has removed a traditional element in the ideological content of our debate. It has not removed, however, the need for governments to commit themselves to the objective of full employment.

I envisage the Report having a major impact on the on-going debate on the future evolution of social protection, both in my own country and indeed worldwide. Of particular interest to us is the discussion on the matching of resources with needs in the light of present unemployment levels and within the prevailing socio-economic climate.

Like those of other developed countries, Ireland's social security system has grown from humble origins, and largely on an ad hoc basis, into a relatively wide-ranging system. At the foundation of our State in 1921 we inherited a tradition of social security based on a system of flat-rate benefits differentiated by family size. Following the establishment of the Department of Social Welfare in 1947, the 1952 Social Welfare and Social Insurance Act provided for the unification and simplification of social insurance services and the foundation of a single social insurance fund. During a period of sustained economic growth between the 1960s and the early 1970s, the system of social protection was substantially expanded and enhanced with the introduction of many new schemes to cater for different groups and needs.

The direction of our social security system has been influenced by international developments. Prior to our membership in the European Community, Ireland had already ratified part of the International Labour Organization's Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118). In 1971, we ratified the Council of Europe's Code of Social Security, which is based on the ILO's nine branches of social security relating to medical care, and sickness, unemployment, old-age, employment injury, maternity, invalidity, family and survivors' benefits. Change was accelerated after joining the European Community in 1973.

In line with the concept of the free movement and equality of labour which is central to the economic philosophy of the Community, directives on equality and reciprocal arrangements between States in relation to workers' insurance records were also adopted.

We recognize that the social welfare system must continuously adapt to the changing socio-economic environment. Ireland, in particular, is faced with the problems of a rapidly growing labour force in comparison with the developed world, rising unemployment levels and, in the longer term, a trend towards an ageing population. Last year, around I£3.4 billion was spent on social welfare payments. This represents 36.4 per cent of the entire Government's current account expenditure. The funding of this enormous sum has placed severe pressure on the public finances which are already operating under tight monetary constraints.

Questions on the future of Ireland's social security system mirror the international debate on the effectiveness of social insurance to meet the changing needs of today's disadvantaged. Doubts about the fundamental rationale of the welfare State itself have been raised by some commentators. The concepts of community responsibility and social solidarity are increasingly being challenged, as evidenced by the rise of racism and antagonism toward immigrant populations within the European Community.

Considerations of efficiency and productivity have reinforced this assault on the tenets of post-war European social protection. In addition, it is sometimes asserted that European labour costs prevent Europe from competing successfully with developing countries. Taken together, these doubts threaten to uncouple the social partnership approach to economic progress and social cohesion as being the two sides of the same coin.

Traditionally, Ireland's social welfare system has been a mixture of social insurance and social assistance schemes. Our policy has been to expand social insurance schemes to cover all appropriate groups, while ensuring that social assistance continues to be developed as a safety net for those who cannot be covered by the insurance system. The self-employed were incorporated within the social insurance system in 1988. The inclusion of part-time workers in 1991 was a reflection of the labour market but also highlights, in my country, the changing role of women in the workplace as outlined by the Second Commission on the Status of Women in Ireland. Increasingly, the traditional idea of women's dependency in the family is being changed in line with the modern practice of respecting each individual as an individual.

I share the Director-General's political belief that society has a responsibility to care for all of its members. The essence of this social contract is that the administration of this care must ensure that those most in need are given priority.

In Ireland, despite the increasing pressures on the funding of the social welfare system, we have ensured that social welfare payments have been increased each year, at least in line with inflation, and substantially higher increases have been given to those on the lowest payments, as well as to groups identified as being at particular risk of poverty. We are especially conscious of the needs of families and give particular priority to them, this year, with a substantial increase in child benefit payments. Our major challenge for the future will be to continue to ensure that those most in need are fully protected at a time of financial constraint.

The social security system is sometimes seen as being in conflict with economic objectives. I was very pleased to note that the Director-General's Report draws attention to the complementary nature of social policy and fiscal policy. In my view, economic growth and social security must be automatically linked. That link is a two-way process between the needs of a community and the fruits of its work. Industrial policy is deficient without the provision of a healthy, vibrant and self-assured population. We must not abandon this key while searching for the door to a better economic environment. We must, of course, be conscious of areas of potential conflict of objectives. For example, in the area of unemployment benefits, a balance must be struck between the need for adequate payment levels and the danger that high levels of payment can cause work disincentives through poverty traps.

We should not be afraid of raising such questions; the answers do not necessarily involve any reduction in social protection but can lie in measures such as closer coordination with training programmes and other similar initiatives.

The fundamental purpose of the Irish social welfare system is to provide an adequate level of resources to people in times of need, in a manner which encourages independence and respects the dignity of the individual. In promoting this mentality, vocational training programmes have been connected to a range of benefits. An early retirement scheme was introduced as an advantage to both the younger and older members of our society.

Other schemes to facilitate part-time work highlight an awareness of, and indeed a willingness to adapt to, the changing pattern of the labour market. The gradual withdrawal of benefit instead of the severe loss of all one's benefit on commencing employment is another important step towards ensuring that payments do not inhibit moves towards greater self reliance.

For too long the management and administration of our social welfare system required recipients to become dependent in order to qualify for support. Social protection in the future must encourage enterprise and self reliance among its recipient citizens, while at the same time respecting the economic balances of the domestic labour market.

Let me now conclude by saying that we live in world defined by change. In recent years this chang has been most marked in the countries of Centr and Eastern Europe. And while we welcome this a aptation to democracy and global market forces, v believe that they should not abandon their previo commitments to social protection and cohesion, a beit within the context of a command economy.

In addition, the rapid economic development the newly industrializing countries, which has bee very impressive, should also recognize the need f social balance and equality of economic opportuni

Accordingly, we welcome the attention drawn all these problems in this Report. It sets out a ve clear agenda for future action and highlights ho much remains to be done.

Original Spanish: Mr. PACIELLO (Governme delegate, Paraguay) – It is with singular satisfactio and unashamed pride that we take the floor today representation of the Government of the Republic Paraguay to inform you that the Government General Andrés Rodriguez has complied fully wi the commitments entered into along with his peop before the international community.

This is obvious if you examine our record. Th first law adopted by congress was for the ratificatio of the American Convention on Human Rights.

In the same year an electoral code was establishe and various elections were held under its democrat standards.

On 20th June 1992 the first genuinely free Const tution of the Republic of Paraguay was adopted.

As recently as 9th May this year the first genuin free and democratic elections in our history wer held, as a result of which we now have an oppositio majority in our congress, something which has neve occurred before in our country.

I would like to stress the fact that all these pro found changes have been taking place in a Sout American country which is geographically small, in land, far removed from the predominant world eco nomic trends, where autocracies and states of emer gency have always been the rule, and wher democracy has accordingly been unknown since po litical horizons have almost always been marked by succession of governments of force, revolution an fraticidal struggle. All these changes have bee achieved in the very short time of less than thre and-a-half years, a fact which is indicative of a wel defined determined political will and an unparallele thirst for freedom and democracy.

These structural changes have inevitably met wit keen resistance. These have been given vent by unre stricted freedom of the press and have plunged u into a sea of incomprehension due to a lack of genu ine long-standing practice of democracy and a whol culture forged under the yoke of human rights vio lations, authoritarianism, arbitrariness and the clos ing off of any channel for genuine participation b citizens.

How can we change social and cultural condition such as these? The Paraguayan people have respon ded by greater democracy. The continuous seekin out of what the people want both within politica parties and in all kinds of organizations seems to b the only valid means of enabling free men to clai the prerogatives that have been denied and disre garded as they gain awareness of their value as in replaceable elements in the forging of a common destiny.

These are the considerations which have provided the framework for our freedom-based Constitution with which we aspire to build a new society with greater solidarity, a more human and more worthy society.

I would like briefly to refer to some of its basic concepts.

First of all Paraguay has defined itself as a social State based on the rule of law. This imposes on the entire legal framework the imperative need to consider social rights alongside individual rights since it is the obligation of the State to remove obstacles to equality of opportunity in sharing the benefits of culture, property and natural resources, which are not the property of individuals but of society in general.

The Constitution also states that the Government is a representative, participative and pluralistic democracy.

All this leads us to the conclusion that the great challenge facing us is the building of an open, participative democratic society cemented by the values of equality and solidarity. How can we transfer all this to the field of labour relations?

The Government believes that in facing these great challenges we have to follow two paths which will in the end converge. First of all, we need imaginative solutions. These presuppose a break with the stereotypes of the past. We must abandon the so-called class struggle which has simply led to a state of permanent conflict. It is time for all the sectors involved in production to abandon outdated attitudes of confrontation, and to shoulder their responsibilities in overcoming our underdevelopment. Cooperation, social partnership, shared responsibility for increasing production and productivity in a context of equality and solidarity will lead to the demise of outdated practices.

In this connection, we ask for the greatest possible understanding and solidarity from the International Labour Organization. We believe that it is time to do away with the fictional notion that working conditions are the same all over the world, and that by extension, one set of standards drawn up by the most developed countries is sufficient. The countries of the so-called Third World are calling for more and greater understanding.

Secondly, we need to bear in mind the fact that the predominant economic concepts in the world today are essentially geared to competition. Accordingly, prices which are fixed in terms of labour productivity in the developed world, and achieved through state of the art technologies, will place disproportionate sacrifices on the workers of the Third World, who have endless needs to meet, and lack such technologies, and who are obliged to make enormous sacrifices, which are an offence to human dignity. Hence, the urgent nature of our call for action by the ILO based on criteria of greater fairness.

Integration into more extensive economic areas such as MERCOSUR, in our case, opens up new opportunities, and wider markets. But, in view of the disparities which exist between its member countries, it will be necessary for understanding of the kind to which I have referred, and on the part of all participants in the economic process, the sense of responsibility required by the common challenge we have to face. This is not simply a matter for workers or employers alone. We are all affected together. Bearing this in mind, the Paraguayan Government is striving to offer every possible incentive for involvement by the people as a whole in achieving a degree of consultation and shared responsibility which can give birth to the new society to which we aspire.

This will be built on a foundation of respect for human dignity, and only in so far as this participation respects the postulates of democracy. There is no place now for personality cults, nor unwanted advice. Genuine democratic participation presupposes great purity and transparency in electoral processes so that nobody can spuriously claim to act on behalf of unknown organizations. Honesty in attitudes, aims and procedures is what the Paraguayan Government is constantly aspiring to achieve.

We want a new society. We want a democratic, participative and pluralistic society as the unshakeable foundation for ensuring freedom with social justice. To achieve this it is imperative to involve all the participants and sectors, and especially employers and workers. But the goal can be achieved only by the full shouldering of responsibility by all those of us who are dedicated to raising, in the heart of South America, a clamour of hope ringing with solidarity and freedom and which can only take flight if there is full compliance with the standards of democracy. This is the goal of the Paraguayan Government in all aspects of our national life, as well as, of course, in the field of industrial relations.

Original French: Mr. HAMDI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Algeria) – The unanimous election of the President to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference is a source of legitimate pride for the Algerian delegation, on behalf of which I extend to him our warmest fraternal congratulations.

The fraternal links which unite Algeria with the President's country, Egypt, the cradle of a civilization oriented towards progress and modern thought, are yet another source of satisfaction as we see the President leading our work here today. I am absolutely sure that thanks to his highly respected experience and skill the session will be given the necessary stimulus so that it can find the most appropriate way of tackling the various problems afflicting the world of labour today.

I also extend our congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference.

I am delighted also to see Mr. Michel Hansenne reconfirmed in his important post as Director-General of the International Labour Office, and I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate him and also thank him and his staff for the excellent quality of his Report, which this year covers the particularly sensitive issues of social security and social protection.

This important document will permit member States to appreciate how serious the situation is in a number of regions of the world, and also to see the magnitude of the efforts required in order to promote and improve the economic and social conditions which characterize the situation in almost all of our countries.

This session of the Conference is taking place in a context of radical changes. This confirms the importance of the ILO's technical cooperation activities in a world in full transformation.

The moment has been particularly well chosen therefore to discuss this issue. The establishment of priorities should be one basic theme of our Organization's work, so that it is able to offer member States services which meet their numerous and varied needs.

This subject, which is of the utmost pertinence, is one upon which the Algerian delegation will not fail to make its modest contribution.

The world situation, marked by a rapid development in the international division of labour, is imposing new forms of organization upon us, and also the redeployment of economic and commercial activities. Indeed, the changes that have taken place over the past few years in international relations have not always brought about positive transformations when it comes to promoting and developing our nations economically and socially. This in turn has repercussions upon employment.

The economic and social situation in the countries of the Third World which produce natural resources and raw materials demonstrates that the organization of and the rules applicable to international trade do not reflect a concern for a fair balance between the Third World and the industrialized countries.

We firmly believe that we have to rethink the restructuring of international trade and to reassert the value of raw materials and basic commodities in a new approach to cooperation – one of solidarity, based upon a global strategy for economic co-development.

Envisaging the future in terms of boosting the economy for some or restructuring it for others presupposes the existence of a valid economic base.

Many countries have made considerable efforts and sacrifices to import capital goods to create this economic base.

These operations were possible in a period when financial resources were sufficiently available.

However, for a decade now, a deterioration in financial and trade relations has brought about a drop or even a dramatic halt in economic development.

An immediate consequence has been that employment has suddenly been compromised by an absence of economic growth.

How therefore can we confront this new situation resulting from an unfavourable international environment, ever scarcer and less reliable resources, foreign debt which has grown out of proportion and an ever greater debt-servicing burden? This is the question we now face.

Algeria, for its part, has not been immune to these limitations, despite the fact that it has a number of assets. For example, the country has a diversified and expanding economic base, a well-trained young work force of supervisory staff, high production reserves, accessible energy resources and proven solvency.

On top of that there is an obvious will to implement a programme of action designed to protect and promote employment and to bring about greater solidarity among our citizens.

We are also relying upon greater solidarity at the international level so that North-South financial flows may give rise to positive effects, reversing the present paradox whereby the most affluent are financed by the most disadvantaged.

During the period of relative affluence that my country experienced, a great number of social benefits were of course made available to sections of the population with low incomes or without any income.

A system of social protection was established and a national solidarity system was administered centrally.

The social security system set up in my country covers workers in all spheres of activity, including agriculture.

As for social protection, it is extended as direct support for the most disadvantaged social categories and for people without incomes.

At the moment, structural adjustments which are necessary to ensure Algeria's presence upon the world scene presuppose other forms of income redistribution, it being understood that social security still plays a central role in Algeria.

An unemployment insurance fund will soon be established with the aim of limiting the effects of industrial redeployment, which has led to staff cutbacks and thousands of job losses.

Government action today has to deal on the one hand with enormous social needs and, on the other, with limited and unreliable available financial resources. We are endeavouring, together with all the social partners, to direct social assistance to those who need it most.

I should add that this need is sometimes only temporary, in particular for instance when it is a question of the unemployment benefit system.

But, whatever the case may be, one of the principles that should guide state intervention resides in the establishment of social justice and the protection thereof. Algeria's moral values and potential are permanent guarantees commensurate with the aspirations of its people.

Consequently, the main concern in my country is to improve economic performance and the competitiveness of the production apparatus to make it possible to establish social justice and democracy and to support the most vulnerable layers of the population.

Indeed, for nearly four years now, since 1989, the Algerian economy has been developing in a transitional phase towards a market economy. We would like this development to be pragmatic and realistic, unburdened by any ideological bent and based solely upon present realities.

But we face a situation of emergencies. Our response in the short term is to attempt to reduce the burden of foreign debt and to move towards a competitive market economy in an organized fashion, to overcome inflation and to increase the performance of our enterprises when it comes to producing goods and services.

Algeria intends to remain a reliable economic partner without forgoing mutually beneficial cooperation.

It believes that it can do this without any dogmatism but with a certain sense of realism, based upon its potential and its readiness to welcome anyone capable of contributing the appropriate resources ...

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Bustos Huerta) – I must remind the speaker that he has exceeded the time-limit.

Original French: Mr. HAMDI – ... There are too many children suffering every day from poverty.

(Since the speaker's time was up, he was called to order by the President. He delivered the rest of his speech after the interpretation system had been cut off.)

Original French: Mr. FRISO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU)) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election, I should also like to congratulate the Director-General for the Report he has presented to the Conference. This Report, despite its complex and technical nature, does have the merit of covering in a very accessible and pertinent way the most important challenge before the ILO today.

The ICFTU is delighted to see that the Director-General has very clearly recognized that solidarity is the indispensable foundation for any effective social insurance system, particularly when it comes to social protection. Without a collective commitment towards people who are sick or old, towards the unemployed and towards the most destitute members of society, our societies would simply abdicate their struggle for a society free of fear and need. This point, I think, should be highlighted, because the recent trend has too often been to promote individual responsibility and to denigrate collective responsibility.

The most unbearable forms of this trend have been the tendency to depict the beneficiaries of social protection as undeserving, and as a shameful burden upon the resources of workers – the insult of laziness and selfishness, added to the injury of unemployment. The solidarity I have in mind is based on the premise that social protection is a right, not an act of charity. Consequently the State must bear the major responsibility for basic universal social insurance and protection. This is a responsibility that it cannot evade or transfer to any private initiative without giving rise to a huge social cost.

The problems associated with the increasing share of national income devoted to social protection, in the industrialized world, at least, and the complementary role of private programmes, have a place in this debate. And here, just as elsewhere, the ILO has led the way with its work in establishing international labour standards. Convention No. 102 is the point of reference for all countries when it comes to respecting the minimum levels of protection. The fact that it is "underratified" does not, however, diminish its value. On the contrary, it provides a very striking illustration of the gap which still separates the industrialized world from the developing world.

We should therefore think twice before talking about the establishment of universal social protection systems, even in the most advanced economies: the homeless and the destitute in the streets of major cities, the emergence of the new poor and the resurgence of poverty even in the most affluent of countries, all bear painful witness to the perseverance and exacerbation of shortcomings in social protection.

However, the problems of developing countries are of a totally different order. According to the Director-General, these countries are 50 years behind the northern hemisphere when it comes to social protection. The combination of massive, absolute poverty and inadequate or inexistent social protection in the majority of countries in the southern hemisphere suggests that solidarity should apply between countries just as it should within countries.

One of the priorities therefore should be to allow the developing world to take a decisive step forward in terms of social protection just as a number of industrialized countries did in the years following the Second World War. Consequently, it is painful to see that, far from giving assistance, the contribution of the international community, and in particular that its financial bodies, has been to set up new obstacles on the path towards progress.

The programmes of structural adjustment have always brushed aside social protection considerations, and via the social cost imposed they have painted existing systems into a corner and left them helpless. In this situation, the ILO's role is very clear. There can be no controversy about it in this assembly. Its role is to establish social justice, to put the well-being of workers back at the heart of its agenda and of structural adjustment, and to ensure that other bodies act in the same way. This goes in particular for the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, where existing systems of social protection are now going through major changes in this transitional phase. New systems will have to be oriented towards the new phenomenon of massive unemployment, attributable to shortcomings in other aspects of social policy.

As was said by the Director-General, the importance of the direct role played by the State in the provision of social protection in such countries is all the greater. This debate is taking place at a moment of strategic importance for the ILO, and is consequently all the more important.

On the eve of its 75th anniversary, the Organization is now committing itself to reforming its own structures, and next year it will embark upon a process to rethink completely the guidelines for its activities through to the end of this century and beyond. In this context, the Director-General's Report recalls some of the fundamental facts in the ILO's life.

What is even more important is that this Report helps to focus attention upon what the ILO should be doing and what it should not be doing, and on the fact that its mandate is to channel the combined efforts of its tripartite components in the task of improving workers' conditions throughout the world. In this sense, the ILO is, and will always remain, an organization which serves workers. This vocation is very clearly spelled out in its Constitution and in the basic texts adopted in 1919 and 1944.

If the ICFTU supports a restructuring of the major activities of the ILO, it is because it wishes the Organization to pursue its historical mandate more faithfully, and not to move into new fields of activity which are incompatible with its terms of reference. To those who argue that the principles of the ILO Constitution and of the Declaration of Philadelphia must be subordinated to the present realities in the world of labour, the ILO must respond by asking whether those realities respect these principles. The ILO should therefore not take on the tasks which do not correspond to it. For instance it should not directly – and I stress "directly" – offer technical cooperation in the field of industrial development and enterprise development, above all because it does not have the financial resources or the technical capacity. It must, however, be in the forefront when it comes to tackling social and labour issues which can promote economic development. This is a distinction which the ILO must be able to make.

The challenge for the ILO is one of redefining the terms of reference which were bestowed upon it when it was founded. Its response should lead to resolute action to awaken the international community, which is mesmerized by the rhetoric and "magic" of the free market.

Original Spanish: Mr. BONMATI PORTILLO (Workers' delegate, Spain) – My first words will be to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and to wish that this 80th session of the International Labour Conference will take place satisfactorily to enable the ILO to fulfil its role in the vanguard of the defence of justice and social rights.

The Spanish Workers' delegation has examined carefully the Director-General's Report whose main subject, social protection, is a subject especially dear to our hearts, since we come from a country where the Welfare State has been barely half achieved and where future prospects are not very bright because of the evolution of the labour market and because of the intentions of some to improve the competitivity of our economy by cutting social contributions and reducing the scope of social security benefits.

The determination to cut public social security to the minimum and rely on the market to provide what is missing, as well as severely compromising distribution and economic growth, is unacceptable, at least in the European context where well-being has been based on collective solidarity and not on individualized assurance and benefits, with state intervention to redistribute income and provide essential services in a fair manner, rather than privatization which increases inequalities by providing benefits in accordance with the capacity of each individual to pay. Where neo-liberal policies have taken over, the result has been a negative redistribution to the detriment of the poorer sectors of the population. Today, at the threshold of the third millennium, images of poverty and marginalization to an increasing degree, and of people without homes and without work, are unacceptable.

In my country the trade unions have been the pioneers in calling for universalization of social benefits and improvement of these benefits to adapt them to social and family realities.

While we recognize that in the past few years social protection has been extended, we cannot but condemn the fact that this has been at the expense of the reduction of the degree of protection, whether through solidarity or through the payment of social contributions, which formerly partially financed the universal benefits. Despite this extension, levels of poverty have not fallen, as is shown by recent surveys and studies. Hundreds of thousands of our citizens today, particularly the unemployed, have no form of income even at subsistence level. Access to another essential, housing, has deteriorated considerably as a result of political speculation.

As concerns ILO instruments on social protection, there are a number of Conventions that my country has not ratified. I may mention in particular Convention No. 168 on Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment, Convention No. 128 on Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits, as well as Convention No. 102 on Social Security (Minimum Standards), where the Government has not ratified the parts relating to old-age and family allowances which are totally insufficient and residual in our welfare system. In his Report, the Director-General refers especially to participation by the social partners in the administration of social security. In this connection, we have to state that not only is our knowledge of the subject minimal and insignificant but, what is more serious, our opinions are rarely taken into account and a host of important decisions are taken without any attempt to consult us. Another vitally important factor is the lack of participation by workers and their representatives in the administration of industrial accidents and disease benefits which in our country are handled mostly by friendly societies run by employers' associations. This would be unacceptable in other European countries and we believe it runs counter to Article 72 of Convention No. 102, as we pointed out to the International Labour Office in our comments on the Report made by the Government of Spain on the application of Conventions and Recommendations to the present session of the Conference.

As I said at the beginning, the future of social security in Spain is quite closely bound up with developments in the labour market. In the past two years economic development in Spain has changed course, which has led to a sharp drop in employment. Despite decreasing the rate of activity, unemployment has today reached about 20 per cent. This high level of unemployment is accentuated by the extreme precariousness of the labour market.

Forty per cent of wage-earners in the private sector are temporary workers and 35 per cent do not even last for a year in the same job. This situation is brought about by a high turnover which reduces working conditions appreciably for the workers concerned, worsens the situation in the labour market as a whole, and makes unemployment more likely, last year led to a Government cut-back on unemployment benefit and is also jeopardizing entitlement to benefits in the future, since increasing precariousness is making it impossible to work long enough in one post to obtain entitlement to maximum benefits, the conditions for which were laid down when posts were more stable and vague. In this context, part-time contracts are being encouraged, which may increase the precariousness and even dislocation of the labour market.

In our country, despite the existence of such forms of contracts since 1980, part-time contracts have not been very widespread up to now. Part-time work only accounted for 4 per cent of workers. In addition such contracts have been heavily concentrated in seasonal activities like agriculture, hotels, personal, domestic and cleaning services, and 70 per cent of part-time workers are women which confirms the theory that a precarious labour market affects women in particular.

As concerns the duration of part-time contracts, during the past year 95 per cent were temporary and for every part-time contract of indefinite duration, there were 602 temporary contracts. Through this process, conditions of work are worsening and part-time workers are earning less and less. A number of studies have shown that part-time work is often an incentive to concealed or clandestine employment alongside lawful forms of employment.

Part-time work, which can be a means of increasing figures concerning the employed population and may meet the requirements of some sectors of the population, to operate properly and as a properly structured labour market needs decent conditions of work, full observance of the law supervision of the legality of the contracts by public authorities, and wage levels which are high enough to prevent marginalization of the worker. However in our country these conditions rarely exist.

Another matter before the Conference which the trade unions of my country cannot fail to mention is cooperation. In the context of far-reaching changes in the world and growing internationalization of the economy and regional integration, it is more necessary than ever to establish new models for cooperation which will enable us to narrow the gap separating rich countries from poor countries. This cooperation cannot take the form of charity which will only create more bonds of dependency but must be an effective means of helping less developed countries and regions to work out their own ways of development and eradicating poverty.

Lastly, I have to inform you that the trade unions are against the employers' proposals which would weaken the role of the ILO. Today, the theories of deregulation and blind faith in the market have led to greater poverty and inequality, as well as economic inefficiency, and in many countries, those who are defending the interest of the workers and the most needy, are still paying for it by being thrown into jail and sometimes with their lives. Finally, when peace is continually threatened by conflicts of various kinds which are nearly all the result of inequality between citizens or between countries, the role of the ILO has to be to strengthen the instruments which are its lifeblood.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Ninth sitting

Monday, 7 June 1993, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Abdel-Hak

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference for a communication.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I should like to make an announcement on behalf of the Officers of the Conference. The Conference has before it a resolution submitted by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives (to be found in Provisional Record No. 4A) concerning the granting to Romania of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution.

Under paragraph 5 of Article 19 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, a record vote must be taken on this resolution.

As in a similar case last year, the Officers of the Conference were asked whether, in order to save time, it would be appropriate to suspend this requirement under the provisions of Article 76 of the Standing Orders.

Considering, on the one hand, that Romania lost its right to vote because of a slight delay in the payment of the outstanding balance of its current contributions, and that in these circumstances the restoration of its right to vote would seem to be non-controversial and, on the other hand, that the suspension of a record vote would simplify the functioning of the Conference, the Officers of the Conference concluded that such an action would meet the criteria laid down in Article 76 of the Standing Orders. They consequently unanimously recommend the Conference to suspend the application of paragraph 5 of Article 19 of the Standing Orders to this resolution and to adopt this resolution by consensus or, if there is a request to this effect, by a vote by a show of hands.

It is understood that steps will be taken to bring this recommendation to the attention of the Conference sufficiently in advance for it to be acted on, in accordance with Article 76, when the vote on the resolution is taken, and for appropriate announcements to be made.

Original Hungarian: Mr. KISS (Minister of Labour, Hungary) – First of all let me congratulate the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite certain that his presidency will greatly help this session of the Conference to complete its mission. Before I continue my statement I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on being re-elected as Director-General. I wish him well in his continued leadership of the ILO.

On behalf of the Government of Hungary, I would like to express my appreciation for the effective and pioneering work done by the International Labour Office, carried out under the leadership of the Director-General. I would also like to convey our Government's gratitude to the Director-General for his Report which deals with issues of great importance to us, and congratulate him on the high standards of the document. The theme discussed in the Report, Social insurance and social protection, is of historical importance and, at the same time, of vital relevance to us. I said historical since the social protection system, one of the most crucial aspects of social development in the twentieth century, has become an organic part, and, what is more, a benchmark of the democratic achievements of a country. Equally historical is the role that the International Labour Organization has played in this development process ever since its foundation.

The question of social protection is particularly important for Hungary, trudging forward on the road of economic restructuring. We are fully aware that through social protection and through strengthening the position of the workforce and of individuals, a higher level of social and political stability can be assured, which, in turn, is a necessary ingredient for economic recovery.

A painful contradiction of economic recession, however, is the increased need for social assistance, at the same time as resources for it are shrinking. Satisfying the dual requirement of social justice and economic efficiency under these conditions becomes next to impossible. On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Hungary which is pushing through revolutionary changes regarded inconceivable for decades, I would like to take this opportunity to express our commitment to preserving as well as improving upon our achievements on the social front, however difficult this may be.

The key to progress in this area is to improve democratic institutions. The elections concerning social security, held last month, were indeed a crucial event in this development process. Soon municipalities which deal with social security will be established following those elections which are testimony to the harmony between Hungary's historic past and the timeliness of social protection. Under this system, social insurance will once again cover those who pay their dues and are insured, following a pattern first commissioned in the early years of this century.

In Hungary, as in many other countries of our region, cushioning the inevitable employment-related effects of the economic crisis, and restructuring, are issues which are very much at the forefront of social protection. The Government has an immense responsibility with regard to managing an employment policy to protect the temporarily unemployed and to provide financial assistance as a last resort for people threatened by alienation detachment and social exclusion. That is why the recent phenomenon in our labour market, whereby the rise in unemployment has levelled off and the number of registered unemployed has fallen for the first time in the past few years is so important for us.

Unemployment currently stands at 13 per cent and, though we should not assume that it represents an about-turn of the trend, we are still convinced that this change reveals significant facts. First of all, it indicates that the Government's new mid-term policy is well-founded and realistic. One of our main aims is to encourage employment, to help people to find employment, to increase the number of unemployed people engaged in public works and to redeploy the long-term unemployed. It is also recognized that there is a close correlation between the level of unemployment and our ability to increase the skill level of our workforce through vocational training. We are making great efforts, therefore, to reform and promote our national vocational training system.

In resolving employment-related questions, both at local and national level, we rely more than ever before on the cooperation of local authorities and employers' and employees' organizations. It has taken us a very short time to bring our labour market institutions up to European standards, and this has helped us greatly in our work. Through legislation we are encouraging the social partners to promote the principles of tripartism to the best of their abilities and to set up a new type of institutional system based on collective bargaining and on statutory and administrative mechanisms. We firmly believe that tripartism is an indispensable element of political democracy and of the market economy, since a social consensus on the aims of economic policy can only be ensured through social dialogue among the partners.

Mr. President, I would like to draw attention to a number of aspects of Hungary's relations with the International Labour Organization. One is the affirmation and reinforcement of our commitment to ensuring that international labour standards are applied in every possible way and to achieving the noble objectives of the ILO. With this aim in mind, we attach a great deal of importance to our accession to the ILO Conventions. As part of this process we have ratified 12 such Conventions this year. I would also like to take this opportunity to express the gratitude of our Government for the invaluable contribution made by the International Labour Organization to the solution of our domestic labour problems during the transitional period. We greatly appreciate the high-level assistance received as part of the technical assistance projects established under a new ILO initiative. On the basis of this experience, we can confidently state that this policy of active partnership can only succeed. We feel particularly privileged in having the opportunity to play a pioneering role in the new partnership policy, since we have been chosen as the country whose capital city, Budapest, is to host the first multi-disciplinary team. It is our firm conviction that the formation of the first ILO multi-disciplinary team in central and eastern Europe will increase international recognition of the positive political and economic processes which are now under way in our region, and it gives greater impetus to the transition to a social market economy.

Conscious as we are of the value of our cooperation with the ILO team in Budapest, we are confident that the Hungarian Government will find exemplary solutions, especially in the area of social policy. To achieve these objectives, we would like to strengthen our close and valuable relationship with the ILO.

We have therefore submitted our candidature for deputy membership of the Governing Body. I believe our participation in the Governing Body will open a new chapter in the history of our relationship.

May I conclude by affirming once again the Republic of Hungary's commitment to the principles of the International Labour Organization and by wishing this Conference success in its work.

Mr. MOORE (Government delegate, Bahamas) – On behalf of the Bahamas delegation I congratulate the President on his election to this prestigious office. My delegation also wishes to congratulate the Vice-Presidents. We hope that they will provide the kind of leadership this great Conference needs at this point in its history.

Traditionally, these statements in plenary are in response to the Director-General's Report and provide a country's view of the issues and concerns raised by the Director-General. For reasons that I hope will become obvious, I want to make a slight departure from the traditional format and offer instead a brief explanation of my country's absence from ILO meetings since 1988, and to say what we intend to do in the future. This statement, then, is a reaffirmation of my country's belief in the principles upon which the ILO was founded and operates, and its intention to adhere to and be guided by those principles.

On 19 August 1992 the Bahamian people voted for change, and a new Government – in which I have the honour to serve as Minister of Labour, Human Resources and Training – and began its service to the Bahamian people. The new Government is presently assessing and reviewing its relations with all international bodies, including the International Labour Organization. Such a review would enable us to define our role in such bodies and thereby enhance our participation and involvement in them.

We particularly intend to develop a new approach towards the International Labour Organization, which will lead to a deepening and a strengthening of our relationship. The Bahamas has not been represented at International Labour Conference since 1988, for reasons which are known to many delegates here. The presence of my delegation at this 80th Session – a delegation chosen fully in accordance with the Constitution of the ILO – demonstrates our new commitment to the goals and the objectives of the ILO.

Unfortunately the role and functions of the ILO have not been given the attention they deserve and its activities have not been highly profiled in the Bahamas. It is my Ministry's intention to correct this through the establishment of an ILO desk in the Ministry of Labour, Human Resources and Training. We are presently reviewing and examining all ILO Conventions with a view to ratifying them. We expect to make considerable progress in this area by the time of the 81st Session of our Conference.

The Bahamas is attempting to diversify its service-oriented economy which is based on tourism, finance and banking. Consequently, we are seeking to attract more foreign investment. My Government will seek to ensure that sources of investment funds are from ILO member countries, and that the rights of workers and any economic activity generated by such fund are protected in accordance with ILO standards.

The public service of the Bahamas needs to be reformed in order to provide quicker and more efficient service to the Bahamian people. This is absolutely vital after 25 years of manipulation and political direction. A quality public service oriented to respond quickly to the needs and goals of the Bahamian people is the objective of my Government, and we believe that the ILO has tremendous expertise in this area and can be of enormous help to us. Therefore, we will be calling upon the ILO to provide us with the technical assistance and the expertise to assist us to bring about a new, highly motivated and efficient public service in the Bahamas.

Similarly, the Bahamas needs to encourage small business enterprise development in order to expand job creation and provide employment for our many unemployed young people. Again, we know that the ILO has developed tremendous areas of expertise in this field and we shall be calling upon it to provide us with the technical assistance and experienced personnel in order for us to develop sensible strategies and programmes to meet our real and perceived needs.

The Bahamas recently participated in the Twelfth Meeting of the Standing Committee of Ministers Responsible for Labour in the Caribbean Community. At this meeting several issues, including harmonization of all Caribbean labour laws, were discussed. It was decided to draft a set of principles of industrial relations and a model labour code for the Caribbean region based on accepted ILO principles and standards. The Bahamas has agreed to host the Thirteenth Meeting of the Standing Committee in 1995 and as the incoming chairman of this Standing Committee I shall be seeking the assistance of ILO in this effort.

The Bahamas is committed to tripartite consultation and bodies, and to implementing certain procedures which ensure effective consultation between representatives of the government, employers and their organization, workers and their organization. My Government is committed to the removal of the adversarial approach to industrial relations and to fostering an approach based on mutual interest, respect and consultation. To this end we will encourage the creation of conditions which are favourable to both employers and workers to engage in continuous and sustained dialogue. In return, we shall expect increased productivity, quality service, employment generation and a more harmonious relationship between employers, workers and the Government.

Before I conclude, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his very comprehensive Report on social insurance and social protection, and on the activities of the ILO. We in the Bahamas are pleased at the continued expansion of our social security scheme. Initially, many persons, particularly those in the informal sector, were reluctant to join the scheme. The massive promotion programme aimed at bringing all workers into the scheme is under way, and it is proving beneficial.

The provision of universal health care was also high on our Government's agenda: a national task force has studied the problem and made recommendations. These recommendations are now being studied with a view to their eventual implementation.

I express my gratitude for the opportunity to make this brief statement on behalf of my delegation. I trust that this session of the Conference will be another in a long line of successful and important ILO meetings. May God bless these proceedings.

Original Arabic: Mr. MOUBARAK (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Iraq, I have pleasure in presenting you with my warmest compliments and in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. Their experience and competence auger well for the smooth progress of this session's proceedings, culminating in decisions and results that will further the aims and principles of the ILO.

I have the honour of conveying the best wishes from Mesopotamia of President Saddam Hussein and of the Government and people of Iraq for the success of this Conference and the adoption of resolutions that further the work of the Organization and strengthen and reaffirm international labour standards.

This session of the Conference is being held at a time of imbalance in international affairs, with the scales tilted in favour of some countries at the expense of others. The gap has widened between the aims and principles on which international charters and other instruments are based, and which lay the foundations of international legitimacy, and the implementation of aims and principles under what is called a new world order. We now have ample evidence in the international arena of attempts to interfere in and control the internal affairs of other countries, particularly in the Third World, countries that have always sought to express themselves in complete freedom and to make the choices that will enable them to enjoy security and stability and the fruits of development and progress on an equal footing with other countries.

Attempting to hide behind attractive and sparkling slogans about human rights and international legitimacy in order to justify these supremist aspirations cannot fool anybody since the facts have shown how bereft of credibility are these claims. It has become clear to everybody that the selective approach and the application of double standards has become the norm in international relations. The countries pursuing these supremist policies have used their entire arsenal and technical potential, including depleted uranium bombs, against my country on the pretext of implementing Security Council resolutions approved by Iraq. But the same countries make no attempt to implement Security Council resolutions relating to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

The human rights that are spoken about in such high-sounding terms by these countries were shamelessly violated during the iniquitous aggression against Iraq in early 1991. These violations were repeated in January of this year in the form of air raids and missile attacks on civilian targets and residential areas that claimed the lives of children, women and old people. Mosques, churches, shelters and hospitals and schools were not spared either.

It would seem that insistence on continuing the embargo ...

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT. – Distinguished Minister of Labour of Iraq, may we request you to concentrate on the Director-General's Report and on the Report of the Governing Body.

Original Arabic: Mr. MOUBARAK – The situation has led to the death of more than a quarter of a million citizens in spite of Iraq's compliance with the resolutions of the Security Council. The question of social insurance and social protection chosen by the Director-General as the subject of his Report to this session of the Conference is one of the most important matters before the Conference because it has a direct bearing on the lives of millions of people in both the developed and developing countries. Social protection is limited in many countries to taxpayers whereas social and economic progress and the enforcement of human rights call for the extension of such protection to other citizens and for state coverage of such expenditure, since social security constitutes an advanced stage in the social protection of the members of society.

The extension of social insurance and achievement of comprehensive security calls for the involvement of the social partners and the provision of financial and technical assistance through plans and programmes aimed at achieving economic and social progress. The support of the ILO is essential for countries seeking to establish such plans and programmes.

My country's experience in this field has taken the form of social protection for workers on the basis of the 1971 Pension and Social Security Act, which covers the following areas: health care, compensation for industrial accidents, pensions and social services. As far as health care is concerned, we provide workers with medical care, sick leave and other benefits. Women are entitled to the same benefits, together with maternity leave before and after confinement. They continue to be renumerated for a period of up to nine months.

As far as industrial accidents are concerned, the victims are given free health care and treatment. There is a special invalidity retirement programme and in the event of a fatal accident, the victim's family is compensated. Under the retirement scheme, a worker is entitled to benefit on reaching the requisite age, which after his death, is paid to his family. If he has a fatal accident at work, members of his family entitled to do so, receive an allowance.

In accordance with the Act on social protection adopted in 1980 members of the population on a low income receive benefits from the State and are given a monthly income which helps them to lead a dignified existence.

The agenda of this session of the Conference includes other interesting subjects this year, including how to organize and improve conditions of employment. With regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents we support the adoption of international instruments and we hope that a degree of flexibility might be taken into account when drawing up these instruments so that different countries can ratify and apply them.

As far as part-time work is concerned, we would reassert the importance of this subject and the importance of adopting international standards in order to be able to grant the necessary social protection to workers in this category and the role of the ILO in technical cooperation with member countries should be stepped up since such cooperation undoubtedly contributes to improving labour skills and social and economic well-being and increasing production. We would like to mention here the reduction of ILO cooperation with my country since 1991, since some projects have been frozen without any valid reasons, and we hope that the ILO will resume these projects and strengthen its support for labour in Iraq now that our workers are faced with a number of difficulties resulting from the unjust economic embargo imposed on us.

The items on the agenda of this session include action taken on the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. We fully support the just struggle of the people and workers of South Africa and reaffirm the need to maintain the total embargo so that the racist Government is forced to take account of the needs and rights of this people.

In conclusion, I should like to congratulate those countries which have just joined the ILO and we are sure that they will participate through their tripartite membership in strengthening the work of this Organization.

Original Portuguese: Mr. BARELLI (Minister of Labour, Brazil) – First of all I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour of Egypt on his election to the presidency of this session. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO on his recent re-election. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to highlight the technical cooperation which the Ministry of Labour is receiving through the ILO on such sensitive and important questions such as child labour, through the IPEC programme, forced labour and other matters. We are convinced that this cooperation will strengthen the work of the Ministry of Labour in different areas.

As regards social security, I do not propose to speak at length here today. However, I would like it to be noted that a few weeks ago, my colleague, the Minister of Social Security, was present in the ILO at a seminar which was organized on the problems of social security, and he referred to a number of useful elements of analysis which are being applied in Brazil at present.

The presence of Brazil at this session of the Conference, which marks the 75 years of existence of the ILO, is rather different in nature. The present Government is the result of a process of constitutional change, sanctioned by the presence of people in the streets and in the squares calling for a return to ethics in politics. This is not a demand made only in Brazil. Movements of a similar kind calling for governments with a greater sense of responsibility are emerging throughout the world. It is a good thing that the ethical spirit should be the symbol of our times. This means ethics not only in politics but in economics and all areas of society.

What is the role of the Ministry of Labour in these new and exciting times?

In Brazil, the achievements of the workers are very much along the lines of those of workers in other countries, within the process of industrialization. In 1943, exactly 50 years ago, a whole set of laws was consolidated, which incorporated a chapter on trade union organizations of a corporativist character which, with minor changes, is still valid today. Although recognizing the importance of individual labour contacts, this legislation provides little support and protection today for workers, particularly since it often takes years for rulings to be made in the Labour Courts. Because of this lack of efficiency, the Government, the workers and the employers would all like to improve the system.

The Ministry of Labour, within this framework, very often regulated matters in a very repressive manner.

Today the role of the Ministry of Labour is necessarily a different one. Its main objective now is to try to increase the participation and involvement of citizens in government actions.

In a situation in which economic adjustments have been achieved through recession and wage cuts, it is for the Ministry of Labour to be present in the decision-making process and to ensure that the solutions arrived at do not always result in a reduction of jobs and cuts in wages. To ensure the representation of the workers and their interests in the political decision-making forums is one of the objectives of the Ministry of Labour which grants special importance to the role to be played by citizens.

Moreover, it is for the Ministry of Labour to negotiate always and to promote negotiation by establishing the necessary dialogue between all the social partners. The results of such a policy soon became clear. Today, wage policies in both the private and public sector, as well as regards minimum wages, are based on negotiations of this kind, so that not only have real wages ceased to fall in this inflationary period but clear-cut rules have been established which give both workers and the employers the necessary tranquillity to enter into labour contracts and agreements. The six months since the economic tide changed in Brazil bringing about a growth of the economy are the clearest indicator of the pertinence of the Government's policy which is lifting the country out of recession and, through improved conditions of pay, we are now heading towards development. These are the guide-lines of the plan of the Government of President Itamar Franco.

It is with great satisfaction that I can announce the creation of the National Labour Council which held its first meeting on 27 May this year in the presence of confederations of employers, representatives of the workers and other representatives of society. This Council, a tripartite body in line with ILO principles, will be responsible for the shaping of labour policy, including its legal aspects and future plans, within a framework in which participation and negotiation are the bases for citizenship in the labour world.

But of course it is necessary to go beyond the earlier system of labour relations and achieve a truly democratic system of labour relations.

Several international labour Conventions attribute great importance to collective bargaining. During the periods of military government, these Conventions were defended by the trade union representatives and by professional workers in the labour sphere in an attempt to overcome the many restrictions imposed on democracy and democratic principles in the labour world. Today, these Conventions act as a compass, a guiding star, a guiding light for employers, workers and the Government in the new debate and discussion on the construction and development of a new system, a system of democratic labour relations.

We are now in the midst of this process. In December 1992 I had the pleasure of receiving from the principal partners of the Ministry of Labour their suggestions and comments on this system. Since then, various discussions have taken place to ensure that the changes which have been made are truly the best possible options for the development of our legal instrumentation.

In a country with the territorial size of Brazil, with the differences that exist from the natural majesty of the Amazonian region to areas of absolute poverty and other regions which are highly industrialized, the problems faced by the Ministry of Labour are indeed not simple ones.

As we prepare this democratic system of labour relations, we also have to deal with the problem of the exploitation of workers in the agricultural border areas.

There, where access is difficult, the action of the Government is made even more difficult, particularly as regards inspection activities, when police forces often have to be called in in order to deal with reactions which quite frequently include the use of violence.

We have already expressed our vehement rejection of any forms of forced labour and even in distant areas of the country, the Government has been carrying out substantial measures to demonstrate our presence, to bring justice to those who are exploited, to defend the principles of the International Labour Organization and to put a stop to unbridled impunity.

At the same time, we are placing our confidence in the action of our citizens in the search for solutions to the problems of modernity and backwardness. The National Council of Labour, with its tripartite structure, is now entrusted with creating a current of public opinion to put an end to illegal and inhuman practices. The Government can only apply the law. But the Government along with society can create the necessary awareness to ensure the respect of the right of citizens and workers.

The democratic system of labour relations which we are introducing in Brazil reflects the movement towards ethics in politics – ethics which should always be present in the labour relationship.

The employers of Brazil, through their organizations, are actively involved in creating this new ethical form of politics and in addition to paying great attention to the basic rights of the workers, are constructing solid and participative enterprises which reflect the current nature of relations between capital and labour. Brazilian workers, through their trade unions and organizations, understand that democracy, with its transparent system of negotiations, serves to establish free relationships which respect the differences between people.

In conclusion, we are initiating a great dialogue with the future. Democracy, participation, citizenship are not mere exercises in rhetoric but practices which bring us closer together and create rights and duties which entail responsibilities. Through them we are preparing a world for this and the coming generations. Fortunate are those who came and saw that a commitment to ethics can move peoples. Fortunate too are we who can create such a time.

Original Turkish: Mr. MOGULTAY (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) – At the outset I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents upon their election and express my confidence that under their able guidance the 80th session of the International Labour Conference will fulfil its functions in the best possible manner. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his re-election to his post and convey my thanks for the excellent Report he has prepared for the Conference.

In Part I of the Director-General's Report, on Social insurance and social protection, developments in member countries, the ILO's role in this context and possible options for the solution of problems are discussed in a commendably competent and thorough manner. I think one of the most important messages based on sound observations and contained in this part of the Report is as follows: the establishment and development of the social security system of a country is to a large extent linked to the existence of a stable economy, a democratic and political structure based on human rights and widely organized well-managed social security institutions.

I fully share this point of view. I would like, however, to underline the fact that there is another prerequisite for the social security of the population which is even more important than the ones I have just enumerated. That prerequisite is the effective protection of the right of a person to life. We have all been watching with utmost concern the apathy shown towards the continuation of the ethnic cleansing policies in Bosnia-Herzegovina, situated in the middle of Europe which has never failed to demonstrate public sensitivity for human rights issues all over the world. I urge governments and international organizations to take more active effective measures to stop these unacceptable policies perpetrated against the Moslem population of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Furthermore, I wish to draw your attention to the mass migration of populations as a result of new political evolutions and regional clashes, which bring about significant employment and social security problems, among others, as has been happening in Central Asia, the Caucasus and Eastern Europe.

Over 2 million Turkish nationals presently live in Europe. These Turkish nationals are there at the invitation and with the permission of their host countries. Many of them belong to second and even third generations. It is unacceptable to heart and mind that these Turkish nationals should now be subjected to racist attacks, killing, wounding and burning to death in the very countries where they have lived, produced, earned and consumed for so many years. I would like to hope that, in a world where human rights issues are so lavishly highlighted, such shameful tragedies will not be repeated. As long as this problem continues to be treated with such lack of vigour, however, I am afraid prospects for peace and tranquility cannot be very bright.

I would also like to draw the attention of the Conference to the tendency to relegate to the sidelines the importance of social rights resulting from the economic difficulties which are being experienced on a global scale. Indeed, economic difficulties should not be overcome at the cost of restricting social rights. In my view, as is also underlined in the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO, economic development should be achieved with social justice. To this end, the ILO must step up its efforts to protect this principle through international norms and technical cooperation.

Our Government has taken concrete steps in the labour field in line with the principle that economic development should not be pursued without due regard to its social component.

Since joining the ILO in 1932, Turkey has signed 29 Conventions. During the short span of time that our Government has been in office, we have ratified six new Conventions, four of them basic. In addition to Conventions Nos. 59, 87, 135, 142, 144 and 151, the draft Bill on the ratification of Convention No. 158 will be debated soon in Parliament. Work is also under way to adapt our internal legislation to these Conventions. Multidisciplinary commissions in which social partners participate are instrumental in this work.

Legislation on the trade union rights of public employees is almost finalized, as stipulated in the Government's programme, and will soon be presented to the social partners for their consideration.

Draft Bills for the revision of some restrictive provisions contained in the Labour Act, Trade Unions Act and the Collective Bargaining, Strikes and Lockouts Act are also being taken up in the commissions, with a view to making necessary amendments in line with ILO norms.

The Confederation of Revolutionary Workers' Trade Unions, more generally known as the DISK, has been reactivated and problems concerning the return of their properties to this Confederation have been settled.

Labour management relations are in the process of being restructured, in line with recent developments and needs. Labour inspection has gained priority in this process. I am confident that the productive cooperation we have initiated with the ILO will continue to foster these efforts to restructure and reorganize labour inspection along ILO principles. As a member country we are also prepared to share responsibility in the work which will be carried out in our region.

I would like to underline that all our action in the field of labour is based on participation, conciliation and democratization. We are seeking to make universal standards prevail in labour relations. It is only natural that we need the good-willed support and conciliatory attitude of the social partners so that universal standards can take root.

I would now like to inform you briefly about our growing and expanding social security institutions. In our country there are three main social security institutions which cover government employees, wage-earners and the self-employed. Although these institutions possessed sufficient infrastructural and personnel capabilities, I must admit that, when we came to power in November 1991 we found the social security institutions of the wage-earners and the self-employed to be suffering some shortcomings, as described in the Director-General's Report. As the principle of transparency required, the first thing we did, therefore, was to make public the situation of these institutions. Then we took certain reform measures, starting with the most urgent ones, for which we received the support of the public and in particular the workers' and employers' organizations. Once the legislative process is completed, these institutions will gain healthier management capacities in the short run. Our final aim is to promote unity of standards in these social security institutions.

With a view to establishing unemployment insurance, which does not yet exist in Turkey, the Labour Council was convened and a draft law was submitted for the consideration of the social partners. Moreover, in order to contribute to the equitable distribution of national income, our Government aims at the participation of the State in the financing of social security. In our view, this is a condition of principle in the welfare State.

Today, Turkey has the knowledge, experience, trained manpower and rapidly developing institutions and organizations which are essential for the successful implementation of ILO principles, Conventions and Recommendations, not only in the field of social security but in every branch of social policy. With these assets Turkey is prepared to do its share, in cooperation with the ILO, to make available the experience it has acquired to benefit the other countries of its region. In this context, Turkey has already embarked upon activities of cooperation with the newly independent Republics of Central Asia and the countries of the Caucasus region. To this end, a Conference was organized in Ankara on 30-31 May 1993, in cooperation with the ILO, on Labour administration and tripartite participation and Employment policies, with the participation of Ministers of Labour and Social Security from Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Tadjikistan, Turkmenistan, Kyrgyzystan and Uzbekistan. I wish to thank the ILO and the participating countries for the valuable contributions they made to this Conference.

In this respect, I would like to express our conviction that the aspirations and the efforts of these countries to integrate with the rest of the world deserve stronger and more effective support. The ILO has a guiding function in the efforts for integration and to develop minimum labour standards. In view of our common language and cultural values as well as our geographical proximity to these countries, we are prepared to assume responsibility for facilitating the conveyance of Geneva principles to Central Asia via Turkey.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to commend the ILO for the role it plays in spreading respect for human rights and freedoms, in establishing democracy, in achieving social justice and in fighting poverty. I reaffirm our commitment to support the activities of the ILO in this direction.

I hope that the ILO, which will be celebrating its 75th anniversary next year, will continue to introduce new policies for the improvement of working and living conditions in a changing world. I also look forward to everyone's contribution to and support for this objective.

I also wish a successful conclusion to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and warmly welcome the new Members to the Organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. CORTAZAR SANZ (Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – In addition to congratulating the President on his election to the chair of this session of the International Labour Conference, I would also like to refer to the Report of the Director-General on social security and social protection.

The Director-General recalls in his Report a whole series of objectives of social security. With regard to a large number of these objectives, Chile already has relatively advanced institutions, especially if one considers its level of development. In the past few years we have perfected a number of these institutions but there are still a number of challenges to be met.

There is, for example, the case of old-age pensions. On the one hand, I should like to underline that there exists practically total coverage for wage-earners. The new system is based on the capitalization of contributions and administration by private entities or bodies, but within a strict framework of state regulation. This guarantees minimum pensions to those who have paid at least 20 years of contributions. In addition, some 300,000 special assistance pensions are paid out to those who have not fulfilled these requirements but are elderly and in serious need of help. In the past three years the Government has developed a series of initiatives to improve the system of old-age pensions. Among these, I wish to mention one which allows trade union organizations to appoint administrators for mutual assistance funds, creating in this way new possibilities for participation by the trade unions in the welfare system.

We have also improved transparency as regards costs and benefits and increased by 50 per cent the number of institutions administering these funds, thus increasing competition within the system. Operational management has improved, shortening waiting periods for receipt of benefits, and there is now a legal initiative before Parliament which will make it possible to tackle the problem of the late payment of contributions. Congress is also currently considering a draft law which will widen the scope of alternative forms of investment for mutual assistance funds, set new limits for instruments and issuers and regulate possible conflicts of interest. All these changes will lead to better pensions for people with coverage.

To cover the risk of industrial accidents or occupational illnesses, Chile has for some 25 years now had legislation which includes advanced preventive and curative mechanisms. A few weeks ago we put before Parliament a Bill to improve these types of benefits for workers in the public sector.

As regards maternity care, Chilean legislation affords protection to working mothers and calls for paid benefits for six weeks prior to and 12 weeks after birth. Congress is now considering a bill which aims at ensuring that the amount of the allowance paid more correctly reflects the amount of remuneration received by women immediately prior to taking maternity leave.

As regards family allowances paid by the State, it should be emphasized that for those workers who receive less than $250 per month, there has been an increase of benefits over the past three years of 60 per cent in real terms.

There are many challenges in the field of social security still to be faced. Today we are working towards trying to establish institutions which are more effective as regards protection of the unemployed.

Much of the progress to which we have just referred stems from social agreements in which the most representative trade union organizations of the country participated. For example, the improvements in family allowances are the result of a draft bill which emanated from the national tripartite agreements signed every year by the Government and the main trade union and employers' organizations. Never before in Chile has there been a national agreement of this kind. In May of this year we signed this agreement for the fourth time successively.

As a step on the path towards greater participation, last year we ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). After several sessions of this body we agreed that it was appropriate to ratify a set of ILO Conventions, and I am happy to inform you that in the coming few days a proposal will be introduced before Parliament for the ratification of a series of Conventions concerning various aspects of social security.

The new emphasis which the democratic Government places on social participation is part of a more profound change which is linked to a new concept of the relationship between the market, the state and social institutions. In many of our countries in Latin America, for several decades from the Depression of the 1930s to the economic crisis at the beginning of the 1970s there was a vision of labour policy which, as the Director-General underlines in his Report to the Regional American Conference, was based on the pre-eminent role and position of the state. The State was considered as taking "precedence over the market, while in most cases the social partners, though they did participate, did so only under state supervision".

Many of our countries have moved from that vision of things to another – to a neo-liberal view which seeks to reduce the State's and social institutions' role as much as possible, postulating a pre-eminence of the market in all areas and in no way counterbalancing nature's laws.

Many of our countries are today redefining the role to be played by the market, by the State and by social institutions, and with this new vision there is now a greater role for trade union organizations and other social organizations.

This search for solutions more appropriate to the new realities has also affected social security institutions. While reaffirming the traditional objectives of social security, we must develop a critical capacity as regards those instruments which are most effective in achieving these objectives. In particular, this is true as we now see the difficult situation in which the social security institutions of many countries have found themselves after operating effectively for the better part of this century. In the light of these changes, we believe it would be appropriate to consider reformulating some of the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO with a view to their being more relevant to meeting the realities of the present and the future.

It is only by remaining open to change that we shall be able to find the answers which our peoples and which the international community are calling for. The challenge is to serve the traditional goals, that is to say development, equality and participation, to try to find the most appropriate protection for workers and their families in need, breaking with the prejudices of the past which will not prove useful in constructing this new emerging future.

Mr. TSUJINO (Employers' delegate, Japan). First of all, I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to the President on his election to this esteemed position.

My statement today concerns social security measures, which are the subject of Part I of the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, and I would like to give my views and describe the issues that Japan faces in this area. Although ideas and schemes regarding social welfare differ somewhat according to each country's stage of economic development, they share common aspects.

Social security systems were expanded from the mid-1950s to the early 1970s when economies were growing rapidly, and became an essential element of social policy. But the oil crisis, the worldwide economic problems, government deficits, rising unemployment and the ageing of the population are all having a negative effect on current and future social welfare. These factors, together with more extensive coverage and the increased benefits which were adopted during the years of economic growth, mean that the difficult issues of cutting costs and rationalizing the balance between benefits and contributions must now be addressed.

General social welfare benefits have been criticized for sapping the will to work and draining societies of their vitality, and many countries are now beginning to adopt a different view – that the future path of social welfare lies in encouraging individuals to help themselves and in restructuring social security schemes to support these efforts.

To meet the needs of an ageing society in the twenty-first century and to maintain the quality of benefits provided and improve national welfare, it will be necessary to review the roles played by the public and private sectors, and to use resources more effectively. Another important issue is how to deal with social changes: higher unemployment, more women in the workplace, and more single parents because of rising divorce rates. The new era of economies without frontiers, symbolized by the EEC's single market, is another shift necessitating a new social welfare system in tune with the times. Therefore, exchanges of information and experience in social welfare at the international level has become increasingly important.

I would now like to say a few words on the major issue facing Japan's social security system, and what is being done to reach a solution.

In Japan, the most pressing issue is rising social welfare expenses, especially pensions and health care expenses caused by the ageing of our population, and the higher tax and social security burden that this will necessitate. In 1975, the percentage of taxes and social security contributions in total national income was 26 per cent, of which 18 per cent related to taxes and 8 per cent to social security contributions. In 1992, this had risen to 38 per cent, 26 per cent for taxes and 12 per cent for social security contributions. By the time the population peaks in 2010, the total burden is expected to reach 47 per cent. The Government is examining various measures to keep this figure below 50 per cent, even when the ratio of older population is at its peak.

The issue most difficult to deal with is the increase in pension benefits and health care costs. Of social welfare outlays in 1989, pensions accounted for 51 per cent, health care 39 per cent and other expenditures 10 per cent. Measures which are being considered to slow the rise in expenditure include raising the pension eligibility age from 60 to 65, and expanding the range of care facilities for the elderly, to cut down on expensive hospital stays. Health care expenses for the elderly currently exceed 29 per cent of total expenditure in this area. Health care expenses for persons over 70 are five times those of younger people, and eight times greater when hospitalization is involved. The Japanese population is ageing at unprecedented speed: in 1970, 7 per cent of the population was over 65, and by 1995 this figure is expected to reach 14 per cent. The ratio of our elderly population will have doubled in only 25 years; in the case of France, this took 130 years, and in Sweden, 85 years. In 2007, Japan will be the first country in which 20 per cent of the population is elderly.

Consequently, the problem for us is that the speed at which our population is ageing gives us very little time to amend social welfare, effect changes in public attitudes and values and overhaul our social and economic systems. Thus, the Government's Tripartite Advisory Council on Social Security, in which management and labour participate, is seriously examining the issues.

The NIKKEIREN (Japan Federation of Employers' Associations) believes that the most important measure to deal with our ageing society is to encourage everyone to make their own preparations for old age, which means promoting the spirit of self-help and self-reliance. The more people depend on central or local governments, the greater the burden on taxpayers in the end. This would sap the vitality of our society.

It means that social attitudes must change and social systems be reorganized. Other measures should also be considered, for example, encouraging people to stay in good health from their younger years, developing and introducing nursing and care systems using sophisticated telecommunications networks and promoting volunteer activities.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Ouzir on a point of order.

Original French: Mr. OUZIR (Government delegate, Algeria) – I wish to comment on something which happened in our assembly this morning and which entailed a profound lack of respect for a delegate who was speaking in the general debate. I thank you for giving me the floor.

It is with great regret that I must express the sentiments of the Algerian delegation as regards the procedure used this morning between 12.45 and 12.55 p.m. when His Excellency the Minister of Labour of Algeria was making his speech in the general debate.

We all know – and the Algerian delegation as well as anyone – that the time available to speakers is limited to ten minutes. However, we noticed that the representative of Algeria did not have the benefit of the full ten minutes, and that his speech was interrupted in the eighth minute of his speech.

We all know the procedure used in the international organizations, and particularly in the ILO: the President has the power to interrupt speakers who exceed the time limit. However, we have never witnessed a situation such as that which took place this morning, when the speaker's microphone was irrevocably shut off, preventing him from reading his speech before the plenary, and preventing the interpreters from hearing him.

I request the ILO secretariat to examine the reactions of the interpreters in the various booths; I believe they will find that the interpreters themselves were astonished that the sound from the speaker's microphone had been cut off.

I know that we all have to ensure that time is not wasted, provided that all delegations are treated on an equal footing. We have heard certain delegations which have spoken, thus far, for 35 minutes, others for 17 minutes, others for 15 minutes, and so on.

The Algerian delegation expresses its profound indignation at this inadequate procedure, and the blatant lack of courtesy towards the representative of my country.

I request that a detailed inquiry be conducted into this situation, and that these remarks be included in the record of this sitting.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I thank the delegate of Algeria. I assure him that his point of order will be recorded in the record of this sitting. We shall ensure in future that any such lack of courtesy will be avoided.

(The Conference adjourned at 4.45 p.m.)

Credentials

First Report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 80th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. John Ausman, Government delegate, Canada, Chairman; Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, Employers' substitute delegate, Argentina; and Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office (Provisional Record No. 6, p.6/20), a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference and two States (the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kazakhstan) have been admitted to membership in the Organization.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organization represented at the Conference is at present 151. To date 13 member States (Armenia, the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Djibouti, Dominica, Fiji, Grenada, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Uzbekistan, Yugoslavia) have not sent a delegation.

4. Concerning the case mentioned in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of a country (Zaire) for which communications appointing delegates and advisers to the Conference had been received from different sources, the Committee took note that the legal adviser of the ILO had, after consulting its members, written to the Legal Counsel of the United Nations to obtain clarifications on this question in the light of precedents and in accordance with usual practice in such cases. The Committee will revert to this matter shortly.

Accredited delegates and advisers

5. The total number of accredited delegates is 570, comprising 286 Government delegates, 140 Employers' delegates and 144 Workers' delegates.

6. There are 1,447 accredited advisers, comprising 692 Government advisers, 336 Employers' advisers and 419 Workers' advisers.

7. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 2,017.

8. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted bythe Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 51 women among the 570 delegates accredited to the Conference and 231 women among the 1,447 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 282 as against 262 last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

9. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to continue the practice adopted at its 49th Session of fixing the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates registered, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference as to the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

10. At this time the number of registered delegates is 461, comprising 239 Government delegates, 104 Employers' delegates and 118 Workers' delegates.

11. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1,117, comprising 569 Government advisers, 218 Employers' advisers and 330 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

12. Forty-eight advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

13. Since 15[1] States represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the Organization, these States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 34 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

14. In addition, one registered Workers' delegate is not taken into account in the calculation of the quorum because of the provisions of article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

15. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 237.

16. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 260. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation. The Committee stresses, in this connection, the need for the registration of delegates and advisers to commence as early as possible on the Monday preceding the opening of the Conference to enable the delegates and advisers concerned to attend their respective pre-Conference group meetings.

Incomplete delegations

17. In his brief report, the Chairman of the Governing Body had noted that a certain number of delegations were so far incomplete. In this connection, the Permanent Mission of Ethiopia sent a note to the Committee informing it that the delegation of Ethiopia was incomplete due to the inability of the Government to cover the expenses of all delegates. To date, the delegations of six countries (Afghanistan, Ethiopia, Equatorial Guinea, Liberia, Somalia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia) are exclusively governmental. In addition, five countries (Albania, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic) have not accredited an Employers' delegate and one country (Guatemala) has not accredited a Workers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

18. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organization, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expressed the hope that governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be repected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

19. Three observer delegations, mentioned in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, are attending the Conference.

Organizations and liberation movements invited

20. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) – relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections[2]

21. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work would be facilitated if credentials reached the Office within the time limit provided for under Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments utilized the suggested form for credentials of delegates, enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. It would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organizations which have agreed to such nominations.

22. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 7 June 1993

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We will embark on this morning's agenda with the fourth report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5C. If you have no objections, I shall take it that this report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The second item on this morning's agenda is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. KANERVA (Minister of Labour, Finland) – Allow me first of all to present my congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election. I wish them every success in their high offices.

In his excellent Report, the Director-General deals with the important subject of social security systems, their coverage, development and maintenance. This subject is of equal importance to the industrialized countries, the developing countries and countries in transition.

As the Director-General states, the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all individuals and households enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and to accept change, and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability. The right to social security is one of the basic rights of the individual and a part of human well-being. Its development all over the world strikingly illustrates the need for and usefulness of cooperation between governments and the social partners.

Yet a combination of events can lead to a reappraisal of the social security system. A new order of priorities may have to be set under unprecedented economic constraints. Finland faces such challenges probably more acutely than any other industrialized country and I believe that our experience is of interest to this audience.

The economic growth of Finland has been rapid during practically the whole period since the Second World War. The incomes of its citizens have increased almost every year. It has thus been possible to achieve substantial improvements in the social security and public welfare services without placing any growth-preventing burdens on the private sector.

The Finnish social security system reflects the ideals of the Nordic welfare State. All residents of Finland are entitled to minimum protection, so-called basic security, in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or childbirth. In addition to this basic security, members of the working population receive earnings-related benefits. These basic and earnings-related benefits were developed into a relatively comprehensive system in the years of particularly strong economic growth in the 1980s. A few years ago, however, the economic growth turned into a recession.

Government tax revenue has decreased and it has been necessary to increase foreign borrowing. Retrenchment of the public economy has been necessary, part of it being focused on social security.

When adjusting the level of social security, we in Finland have not forgotten that basic security is necessary for human dignity and should always be ensured in accordance with the spirit of the conventions on social rights of the United Nations, the ILO and the Council of Europe.

Despite the recession and the need for readjustment of social security, Finland has no intention of abandoning the ideal of the Nordic Welfare State. Finland will also continue to adhere to the international conventions on social rights. We are even going to improve the social protection necessary for a worthwhile existence. A revision of the provisions concerning the fundamental rights of individuals as defined in the Constitution will soon be submitted to Parliament. This revision would provide the necessary income security in all circumstances.

The target of full employment will be defined in accordance with the principles of the ILO. This does not mean that everyone will be guaranteed a job, but it sets the targets for employment policy. The reform of fundamental rights outlined by the Government will also guarantee freedom of association, occupational safety, and equality between men and women in working life in accordance with ILO principles.

It is important that social provisions and labour market incentives reinforce one another. It is particularly important to avoid circumstances in which social policies reduce the flexibility needed for viable labour markets. Labour market policies and social policies will increasingly be linked together in order to encourage labour force participation and thereby ensure that incomes remain sufficient.

Most social expenditure is financed by social security contributions paid by employers, workers and the State: in Finland these contributions raise the wage paid by more than one-third. By increasing labour costs, these contributions may reduce employment. Accordingly, it is important to investigate the scope for switching the financing of social expenditures away from arrangements based on payroll size to other modes of payment which may have a less unfavourable impact on employment.

I do not wish to conclude without expressing my country's satisfaction at the election of Mr. Hansenne to steer the ILO for another five years. The prevailing changes will probably run even deeper than what we have experienced hitherto. Aims, courses of action and structures are increasingly being questioned. Finland trusts that the Director-General will help adapt the ILO while safeguarding the Organization's sound tripartite basis and its role as a standard-bearer in the most essential field of human activity.

Original Arabic: Mr. LOUDGHIRI (Minister of Employment, Handicrafts and Social Affairs, Morocco) – In the name of God, The Merciful, The Compassionate! Allow me on my own behalf and on behalf of the Moroccan delegation to congratulate the President on his election. I am sure that his great wisdom will help us to achieve favourable results at this Conference for the world of work.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his re-election to the office of Director-General of the ILO. I am certain that he will make every effort, drawing on his long experience and highly developed skills, to guide our Organization forward so that it fulfils the aims laid down in its Constitution.

In the first part of his Report the Director-General dealt with a very important subject: social insurance and social protection. The choice of this topic shows the importance that the Director-General attaches to the aims for which our Organization was established and his determination to fulfil the tasks assigned to it.

In the present-day world, with its great diversity of economic and political systems, social insurance is an effective tool for achieving social justice and reflects a form of solidarity on the part of society. It is also a way of expressing appreciation of workers' participation in production by guaranteeing them an income that enables them to meet their most basic needs in the event of unemployment due to old age, sickness, disability, industrial accidents or occupational illness.

In view of the important role of social security, a number of countries have reviewed their social security policies, sometimes developing them or changing them radically. These initiatives have been taken in the light of a number of factors: the deteriorating world economic situation in recent years, the adverse impact of structural adjustment policies in some countries and the ineffectiveness of the methods hitherto used to set up and administer social security institutions in many countries.

Social security is generally considered as an important achievement on which there should be no backpedalling. We must also remain true to the principles on which social security is based, in particular, solidarity. Furthermore, practical steps must be taken to make social protection systems in member States more effective.

We therefore agree with the Director-General when he says that the ILO's contribution in this area must focus on the following points: (a) reform of social security programmes and adaptation to structural adjustment policies; (b) development of the structures of the bodies responsible for administering social security; (c) establishment of a second financial basis for social security systems; (d) extension of social security to categories that are not covered at present. We consider that these aims can only be achieved if the ILO steps up its action in the area of technical cooperation on behalf of all countries standing in need of such assistance.

While we are discussing the topic of social security, I would like to give a brief outline of my country's policy in this area. It is natural that we have attached great importance to social insurance from the earliest years of independence given the positive effects of such insurance on the material conditions and morale of the workers. Thanks to the solidarity shown by the social partners, the social insurance system was established gradually and nowadays provides most of the benefits in the commercial and industrial sectors, the professions and the crafts sector.

In response to royal directives, we have also drafted revised legislation relating to industrial diseases and accidents in order to ensure that workers receive adequate benefits while stressing the need to prevent accidents and rehabilitate victims. A few months ago, we also adopted a draft decree which extends social insurance to workers in the crafts sector.

Bearing in mind the importance of the social security system for the total social protection of workers, our country is concentrating its efforts on the following areas: reform of the national social security fund and the extension and improvement of benefits; restructuring the national social security fund with a view to improving its administrative and financial operations, and reform of its communications system; finding realistic solutions for the Fund's health-care system, with a view to enhancing the finances and operation of medical bodies associated with it.

Our agenda in this Session of the Conference includes a number of subjects of vital importance, such as the prevention of major industrial accidents and part-time work. As regards the first subject, my Government made its views clear during the previous Conference. We hope this year the Conference will adopt a Convention and a Recommendation promoting measures to protect both workers and the environment. As regards part-time work, I would like to point out that this system of work can benefit enterprises and workers because it helps to create employment and to combat the effects of unemployment, while enabling workers to reconcile family responsibilities with the responsibilities of gainful employment. At the same time, it can create certain difficulties with regard to conditions of employment, working conditions and social protection. For this reason, we hope that the Conference during this Session will formulate a draft Convention and a draft Recommendation to encourage part-time work and create the necessary social protection for part-time workers.

Before concluding, I would like to again extend my congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO and to thank you, Mr. President, and to wish this Conference every success in its work.

May peace be with you and the mercy of God be upon you.

Original Spanish: Mr. GUZMAN MATTA (Employers' delegate, Chile) – On behalf of the Employers' delegation of Chile, I wish to express the greetings of the employers of our country to all the delegates attending this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and especially to the President, Mr. Abdel-Hak, and the other Officers for the lofty responsibility they have assumed.

As representative of the Chilean employers, I must point out that our participation in this assembly is of great interest to us. Indeed, in his Report the Director-General referred to the development of social security and social protection systems among the member States and the task which the ILO can play in order to contribute to the efficiency of such systems. This is of singular importance to ensure that men and women can live in dignity once their working life has come to an end.

Today, the pension schemes of Latin America and of countries throughout the world are suffering the consequences of a serious crisis. Various countries, including Peru, Argentina, Bolivia, Columbia, Venezuela and others, are attempting to find long-term solutions to this through radical reforms.

When assessing the problems, all agree that this crisis is due to structural causes and not to question isolated cases of mismanagement. On the contrary, it is the bureaucratic organization of existing pension systems, the lack of incentives to achieve efficiency in administration and to stimulate the individual participation of beneficiaries, and the inefficient pay-as-you-go systems of funding which have caused the failure of pensions systems throughout Latin America and the world in general.

In this context, and given Chile's experience in this field, I must refer to the report submitted by the Director-General to the 13th Conference of American States Members of the ILO, held in Caracas in 1992, and to an article published by two officials of this Organization, Messrs. Colin Gillion and Alejandro Bonilla, in the International Labour Review.

Both publications contain an inaccurate and misleading assessment of the Chilean system which does nothing to further the debate on the necessary reforms of pension schemes required elsewhere. Furthermore, I feel that these publications represent a particularly grave problem since the name of the ILO has been used to the detriment of countries which are seeking ideas and support to carry out the changes they need.

The reform of Chile's social security system, carried out 12 years ago, has served as a reference for Latin American countries which are trying to reform their own social security systems. Thus, it is essential to understand correctly the characteristics of the Chilean system, the causes which led to the reform and the conditions in which the reform has succeeded. But neither the report I have just mentioned, nor the work of Messrs. Gillion and Bonilla contributes to such understanding in any way, because of omissions, mistakes and their obvious lack of objectivity.

This type of analysis could lead one to think that the ILO administration is fostering the maintenance of social systems which are now obsolete, and creating obstacles to the creation of new and efficient solutions to the problems facing social security today.

This is not the place to describe the errors and omissions in the documents to which I have referred, but as a mere example, I want to point to the failure to examine the serious shortcomings of the former system; the erroneous reference to the present system's incomplete coverage; and the incorrect statement to the effect that the pension funds in Chile have not helped to develop the Country's capital market.

The former pay-as-you-go system was characterized by insufficient coverage, owing to the number of existing systems. It was also regressive and discriminatory because it favoured the stronger interest groups. Lastly, it was not viable from a financing standpoint, because of the unfavourable trend in the contributor/beneficiary ratio.

However, rather than enumerating the shortcomings of the old system, let me take this opportunity to emphasize some of the positive aspects of the reform carried out in Chile.

Generally speaking, we have set up a system of social security which finances old-age pensions through a statutory, fully funded system based on individual contributions. Benefits depend on the balances of personal accounts. Flat-rate disability, and survivors' benefits are financed through insurance.

It is worth noting that the administration of this system has been turned over to private companies, which compete on the basis of service and rates of return. At the same time, the worker is free to join whatever plan he prefers for reasons of confidence, security and profitability.

Participation in the scheme is voluntary for workers who were covered by the former scheme and for self-employed workers, but it is compulsory for new wage-earners joining the labour force.

From another point of view it is important to refer specifically to three operational aspects of the system, concerning which the report of the Director-General and the work of Messrs. Gillion and Bonilla have a particularly slanted view, namely, the alleged lack of solidarity, the potential inefficiency of administration, and the low expected benefit levels.

As for solidarity, the new pension system has two efficient mechanisms to ensure solidarity. On the one hand, the State guarantees a basic pension; this is the most effective way to protect the poorest, in other words, those most in need of solidarity; thus, public expenditure is not wasted on financing pensions of workers who have better incomes and do not need that support.

On the other hand, the disability and survivors' benefits pensions are financed through collective insurance obtained by each administering entity, thus providing for these risks and enhancing solidarity.

In referring to the efficiency of the administration of the system, I think I should also recall that this objective, in any company or institution, cannot be achieved by mere administrative decrees; in the end, it depends on suitable incentives.

It is for this reason that the Chilean social security system has been endowed with the strongest incentive for efficiency, in other words, competition. The possibility of setting up pension fund administration is open to any competitor, including organized workers; there are no barriers to this, contrary to what was suggested by the report of the Director-General. Today there are 19 administrators of pension funds.

six of which have started up during the past few months.

I should also point out that the private administration of the system does not in any way mean that the State has given up its monitoring role. On the contrary, the activities of the administrators are governed by a legislative framework that can always be perfected, which provides for suitable means of reducing risks and conflicts of interest, and avoiding that funds are used for other purposes than pensions (a frequent problem of traditional pay-as-you-go systems).

Finally, as regards benefits, privately managed individual retirement accounts have the capacity to return more than pay-as-you-go schemes, for the latter are limited by the growing deterioration of contributor/beneficiary ratio and the increasing difficulty of active generations to bear the brunt of the pensions requirements. On the other hand, the profitability of personal funds invested on a long-term basis, including instruments with fixed or variable rates of return and suitable diversifications can fund the pensions of the contributing workers.

I hope that these remarks, which coincide fully with those made yesterday by the President of the Republic of Argentina, Mr. Menem, will lead to a better understanding of the Chilean system which, beyond the shadow of a doubt, has proved a successful response to the crisis of social security throughout the world and in our country. At the same time, I hope that these comments will help to reorient the contribution which this Organization must continue to make to the improvement of the labour and social security legislation in the world.

Finally, let me express our gratitude to the International Organization of Employers for the support given to the Chilean employers, and to the Director-General for enabling us to express our legitimate viewpoint on this very important issue.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Minister of Labour, China) – First of all please allow me to express my warm congratulations to the President on his election. I would also like to congratulate the two Vice-Presidents on their election. I am convinced that their talents and experience will lead this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

In many countries of the world today, slow economic growth has led to increasingly serious problems of unemployment and poverty. In order to alleviate the social consequences of high unemployment and deprivation and to safeguard the personal interests of working people, countries are seeking ways and means to establish and improve a social security system. This has become a major issue of widespread concern in the field of labour at the international level. The Report of the Director-General takes Social insurance and social protection as the theme of this session of the Conference. This, I believe, conforms with the needs and desire of the member States.

China is currently intensifying its economic structural reform. We are actively seeking to establish a socialist market economy and, in line with such an economic structure, a social security system with Chinese characteristics. China's social security system was established at the beginning of the 1950s and developed into an all-embracing system. By the end of 1992, about 210 million workers and their families around the country had benefited from this system to varying degrees. In 1992, the total insurance and welfare expenditure in the country was 131 billion yuan. In recent years, we have carried out a series of reforms to improve the social insurance system and have had remarkable results. Firstly, we have established an old-age insurance system with basic old-age insurance supplemented by enterprise insurance. Basic old-age insurance is compulsory according to State legislation and is financed jointly by the State enterprise and the individual. At present, enterprises in China have established old-age insurance funds at the county, city or provincial level for the purpose of mutual assistance and have, following pay rises for the workers, introduced a system whereby workers contribute part of their wage to old-age insurance. In addition, supplementary old-age insurance is offered by some enterprises out of their own resources. Furthermore, after learning from the experience of other countries we are now trying to reform the calculation and distribution methods of old-age pensions to bring more tangible benefits to the workers. Secondly, unemployment insurance has been introduced in State-owned enterprises, and a number of centres for retraining and practical self-help have been set up. Thirdly, attempts have been made to reform medical insurance and insurance against occupational injury to broaden the scope of such insurance systems so that workers in State-owned and other enterprises may all enjoy equal rights to insurance. Fourthly, old-age insurance for farmers has been started in the rural areas on a trial basis. Fifthly, administrative bodies for social security and unemployment insurance have been started nationwide with the responsibility of collecting, distributing and managing insurance funds. Now, after summarizing the experience of the trial reform projects, we are working on a new set of regulations on old-age insurance for urban workers and on insurance against occupational injury.

The objective of China's reform of its social security system is gradually to build up by the end of the century a multi-tiered social security system, the cost of which will be shared by the State, units and employees and under which the level of benefits will be linked to employees' income. In the meantime, a unified social security management system will be established. Our task is to strengthen legislation for social security by putting emphasis on the reform of old-age pension and unemployment benefits, further the reform of occupational injury and medical insurance, and improve the level of socialized management so as to create a favourable environment for enterprises to transform the way in which they operate.

In short, the structure and benefits level of China's social security system will be compatible with the level of its economic and social development, and closely tied to the development of its productive forces and human resources. The active social security policy pursued in China is both flexible and able to underwrite various risks by providing real guarantees. The reform of urban employees' old-age pension system should be integrated with that of the labour and wage system. In determining the retirement age, labour resources, the employment situation and the inherent difficulties of a job should be taken into consideration. The level of old-age pension should be commensurate with wages. In rural areas, farmers' old-age pension fund will be raised on a voluntary basis from farmers' payments and collective subsidies. The old-age pension system will take many forms and will, in light of the urbanization of the countryside gradually move in line with the old-age pension system in urban areas. Unemployment insurance shall not be aimed only at relief. It should be closely linked with promotion of employment. Registration for jobs should go hand in hand with job creation and retraining with a view to increasing labour mobility and promoting re-employment. Occupational injury insurance should be linked with occupational safety and health, the prevention of occupational injuries, medical treatment and rehabilitation so as to ensure a decent life for injured workers and should provide proper compensation for injury on the one hand and encourage the enterprises concerned to ensure the safety of production methods and equipment on the other. Medical insurance reform consists of the gradual establishment of medical insurance management and of a mechanism whereby medical costs will be shared by all parties concerned, basic medical treatment will be provided, medical and health resources will be used rationally and the irrational growth of medical costs will be brought under control. Such a system combining social security policy with labour policies is of great significance for ensuring an effective social security system, especially for a system which is undergoing reform and development as in China.

We believe that it is worthwhile describing and analysing the conditions in the countries of the world. But what is more important and of greater value is action – a concrete programme of action that will bring about practical results for the vast number of developing countries. It is our belief that the International Labour Organization should adopt a more positive attitude towards social security, and further intensify activities in that field. For this purpose, we would like to put forward the following proposals:

- The International Labour Organization should, on the basis of the Director-General's Report, work out a practical and feasible programme of action that is targeted at the most pressing questions facing developing countries and which will benefit the people of these countries.
- It should provide developing countries with technical assistance, intensified training and consultancy in social security matters and provide more financial resources which could be used to assess or compute insurance funds and help increase the management efficiency of insurance institutions.
- Thirdly, it should strengthen dialogue with international organizations, such as the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme with a view to seeking more funds for social security.

The Chinese Government is ready to work together with other developing countries to strengthen cooperation and an exchange of information on our experiences and then to share this knowledge with the International Labour Organization.

Original French: Mr. NGUYEN VAN TU (Workers' delegate, Viet Nam) – On behalf of the workers and the trade unions of Viet Nam I wish to address our warmest greetings to all the delegates present here and to all the workers they represent. I would like to express my warmest congratulations to the President on his election and also to the Director-General for his re-election. I hope that, thanks to the President's leadership, our Conference will be very successful.

Our delegation has followed very carefully and with great attention the Report of the Director-General, as well as the interventions of the delegates in the plenaries and the discussion in the committees. We commend the contents of the Director-General's Report which gives us a global picture of the urgent problems that preoccupy us.

As you know, at the present time Vietnamese workers and their trade unions are actively preparing for our Seventh National Congress in new circumstances which have determining significance for the future development of our country. Starting from a restrictive economy and moving towards a market economy, a number of serious problems faced us at the beginning. We needed to adapt to the State's new open policy and we have already obtained excellent initial results in various political and economic areas. We are trying to satisfy progressively the needs of the workers and to acquire an accumulation for exports. The policy of investment incentives in Viet Nam has brought us new friends who respect the principles of joint investments, greater equality and mutual benefits, thus contributing to job creation.

Article 10 of the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam, adopted by our General Assembly in 1991 has clearly defined the role and the function of trade union organizations. Our purpose is and continues to be that of defending the legitimate interests of the workers and creating conditions of wellbeing by working hand in hand with the State in the drafting of labour laws, in creating employment policies, and in overseeing social affairs. Employment, life, democracy and social equality: these are our prime objectives. The eradication of hunger and the relief of poverty are also our aim, and we have already obtained encouraging results in this area.

However, in our new circumstances of a market economy, we must resolve a great number of serious problems: for instance, establishing a minimum wage for workers, particularly for those who work in enterprises run by foreign investors, setting up social insurance schemes and schemes for paid leave. The reports and discussions of the various Conference committees are extremely necessary and useful to us.

In the new situation of a market economy, we lack experience to carry out trade union activities. We therefore appreciate the experience of the ILO. We hope to receive programmes and projects focused directly on Viet Nam's workers through the trade union organization – for instance, projects for job creation, for vocational training, job protection, social insurance – and we would especially like to participate in the training programmes organized by the ILO on these issues. We appreciate the initiative taken to organize a seminar which the Regional ILO Office intends to carry out with the Vietnamese trade union organization at the end of this year, and we are ready to cooperate with you to organize this seminar and to make it a success.

Having spent so many years fighting hard for national independence and freedom, the Vietnamese people has no more ardent aspiration than to live in peace and to rebuild its country. With our motto "Viet Nam wants to be friends with all countries", we express our desire to develop solidarity, friendship and cooperation with all the countries of the world, particularly with the countries of our region and our neighbours. From the rostrum of this Conference, I would like to confirm this wish.

May our Conference be successful.

Mr. FALBR (Workers' delegate, Czech Republic) – Let me express our sincere congratulations to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the significant and responsible post of President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and also permit me to wish him every success. This is the first time in ILO history that this distinguished assembly has been addressed on behalf of Czech trade unionists. At the last session of the Conference we spoke about the possible division of Czechoslovakia, which became reality by the end of 1992. In spite of this we, together with our Slovak colleagues, have decided to maintain the Czech and Slovak Confederation of Trade Unions in existence so as to have a platform to try together to solve the first negative impacts brought about by the division of our common State. Of course, our performance and effectiveness working together is limited by the gradually emerging differences in the economic, political and social development of our two States.

We have studied with great attention the Report of the Director-General dealing with problems of social security and social protection. We highly appreciate this Report and we consider the subject itself very significant. After all, in a broader context it is one of the key issues of our activity as protectors of the justified interests of workers. As far as the situation in our country is concerned, we see that the transformation will take longer than expected. The social impacts are harder. Two hundred thousand families in our country live on incomes at minimum subsistence level. The standard of living of many is dropping. It is true that the macroeconomic indicators of our reform show the success of the transformation, as unemployment and inflation are low. However, the decline of production is a threat, our national economy is in recession, and the privatization process is not creating new managerial skills quickly enough. This is why we do not consider the coupon privatization policy as much of a success as it is said to be.

The recent legislative process in our country raises many questions. Irrespective of the professed democratization process, we have witnessed attempts to restrict collective bargaining and so to limit the basic rights of trade unionists.

In connection with the expected increase in unemployment, we have warned the Government about the critical situation which will exist in some regions. We are of the opinion that during the transformation period the role of the State must be larger than our Government is willing to admit.

We consider the existence of the Tripartite Council of Economic and Social Accord as definitely positive. It helps to maintain social dialogue, which is so urgently needed during the transformation process. The importance of achieving social consensus has been stressed by the ILO Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, in his Report. We fully understand that when creating new systems of social security the Government faces a number of problems connected with the whole economic situation and economic growth, the lack of financial means and qualified and efficient administration.

However, it should be stressed again that regular negotiations and consultations with the social partners, making use of the tripartite mechanisms and giving their due to all aspects of the social dimension are necessary to find solutions to all problems and avert social injustice, poverty and misery among some vulnerable groups of workers. This is why we consider the strengthening of tripartism one of the main tasks of the trade unions in the Czech Republic. We consider it to be a basic element for the success of the transformation processes. We feel it is a significant contribution to the building of democracy in our country. The greatest danger for democracy is the polarization between the extremely rich and the extremely poor. A democracy which cannot compensate for its inherent tendency towards polarization is doomed.

I would like to express our profound appreciation for the assistance which we receive from the International Labour Office especially from its workers' bureau and Workers' Education Branch and from other European international organizations and institutions, namely through their promotion of the social dimension and aspects of the present reforms. It is quite clear that the assistance of these democratic organizations and institutions may to a large extent facilitate the path of our country as it integrates into Europe while consistently preserving the rights of men and women, democracy and social equality. In the future we would, however, welcome further active coordination, especially by the ILO, through mutual dialogue and cooperation with the OECD, international financial institutions, international and European employers' organizations and perhaps also with governments. This would be a significant contribution to stabilizing the complex complicated situation in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, where there is a threat of a number of serious social conflicts and where the complicated process leading to democracy will continue for a long time to come.

In this context I would also like to express my satisfaction that the decision was taken to place on the agenda of this session of the Conference the issue of further improving the technical cooperation of the ILO. We believe that the International Labour Office will continue to assist us in the sphere of trade union education, social security, working conditions, the labour market, labour standards and other topics, in which it is among the top authorities of its long experience and profound knowledge. We also highly appreciate the ILO's support in pursuing the ratification of some important international Conventions which have not yet been ratified by our Government.

Finally, I would like to express our full solidarity with the struggle of trade unions and workers of all countries in Europe, Asia, Africa and America who are fighting as we are for democracy, human rights and trade union rights. We certainly feel ourselves an integral part of the world community, the development of which we measure inter alia by the dignity of the lives of men and women on this beautiful planet, on all the continents and regions represented here today.

Mr. POPESCU (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania) – I have the honour, Mr. President, to address to you on behalf of the delegation of Romania and on my own behalf my sincere congratulations on your election as President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and I wish you every success in the fulfilment of your mandate. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the ILO.

This session of Conference is taking place at a time of political and economic upheaval and, in some regions, military confrontation, and all of these events have major repercussions on the social side of our life.

We should therefore join forces to identify ways and means of overcoming the difficulties and improving the living and working conditions of large categories of the world's population.

It was with great satisfaction that I learned from the Director-General's Report of the decision by the International Labour Organization to gear all its activities to the rapid changes now taking placed to embark resolutely on the path of reform in keeping with political, economic and social developments, and to widen the scope of its activities for involvement of and cooperation between the social partners.

The three priority goals put forward by the Organization, namely the promotion of democracy, the fight against poverty and of social security, define the ILO's role in promoting respect for human rights and social justice.

We are equally appreciative of the ILO's willingness to grant specialized assistance to Members of the Organization, through greater efficiency, under the constraints of a zero growth budget.

At the same time, I would like to draw attention to another topic discussed in the Director-General's Report, namely that of the ILO's role in increasing the effectiveness of the social protection systems of member States.

To promote the transition from an excessively centralized system, which until 1989 prevailed in every field of activity in Romania, to a market economy, further steps will have to be taken in our country to develop a genuine labour market.

To this end, the liberalization of labour costs has been regarded as an integral component of a free labour market and statutory mechanisms have been created to establish wages through direct bargaining between employers and workers' representatives. As a result of this, labour unions this year concluded national collective agreements with employers' representatives, this process being carried out at sector, group and enterprise level. Steps had previously been taken to consolidate the organizations of the two social partners and set up a democratic tripartite structure within which the Government assumed the role of mediator.

The collective bargaining and tripartite system now function more effectively in Romania, a fact which is becoming clear from the consultative meetings and the talks which take place whenever important issues arise in the field of labour affairs and social security. I should mention in this context the negotiations and tripartite consultations which took place in early May this year. On that occasion, agreement was reached inter alia on a national gross minimum wage and ways of ensuring that it is paid, an institutional framework to promote good relations between labour organizations, employers and government, the establishment of a family budget to ensure decent living standards, an income tax system, and other topics.

We are concerned at the sharp rise in unemployment, which at present amounts to about 9.5 per cent of the active population and includes a high proportion of young people and women, which is a cause of particular concern. In Romania, as elsewhere, the impact of the policy of economic reform and the decrease in labour productivity has had a detrimental effect on the national employment programme, incomes, and on social security programmes in general.

The determination of the Government to act in the short term to reduce unemployment will entail, first and foremost, greater efforts in the field of education and training, especially for young people and women, as well as in retraining the unemployed in the light of the demands of the labour market and the necessity of creating new jobs. Accordingly, the Government will be adopting measures to promote the development of private property and the creation of small and medium-sized businesses, and will encourage public investment, as well as private investments of domestic and foreign capital. It will in addition promote a proper fiscal and credit policy to benefit entrepreneurs and will accelerate the process of land distribution and the creation of small farms.

The Government's programme, the aim of which is to relaunch Romanian industry and ensure a national correlation between the funds held by enterprises on the one hand, and production and labour productivity on the other, naturally pays particular attention to social security; it aims to coordinate the efforts of all the social partners in the field of employment, to compensate for the social costs entailed by the liberalization of the labour market, to facilitate a more detailed study of the material and social condition of the populace, especially of the most disadvantaged categories, to fight poverty, and to overhaul the social insurance system.

On the basis of the consultations and of the different aspects of labour affairs and social security, the Government supports the creation of a tripartite council for social policy.

We are aware that the development of a free labour market depends on improving the management of that market. The Romanian Government is committed to action in this area, by mobilizing national resources and by cooperating with international organizations and with other interested countries. In this context, I would like to draw attention to the cooperation between my Government and the ILO, the European Community, the Council of Europe, the UNDP, and with the Governments of Germany, France, the United States, Belgium and Italy.

Another important area of concern for the Romanian Government is the elimination of all forms of discrimination. For this purpose, the Council for National Minorities, a consultative body, was recently set up in accordance with the decision passed in late March this year, which expresses the willingness of the Romanian Government to promote respect for human rights, including the rights of national minorities. It is also based on the constitutional provisions concerning the equality of rights of all citizens as well as on the recognition and guarantee of the rights of national minorities. The Council's basic prerogatives include the promotion of relations with legally constituted organizations of people belonging to national minorities, and the implementation of statutory, administrative and financial enactments promoting the rights of people belonging to national minorities, with particular regard to the preservation, development and expression of their ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious identities, as they are laid down in the Constitution of Romania and in the international treaties and conventions to which Romania is a signatory party.

I avail myself of this opportunity to inform the Conference that, since the last session, Romania has ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), and the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168).

In conclusion, I would like to assure the Conference that Romania, as a founding member of the International Labour Organization and active participant in it, will be paying particular attention to the celebration in 1994 of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Mr. SCHRAMA (Government delegate, Netherlands) – May I begin by congratulating the President on his election.

Congratulations are also due to Mr. Hansenne on the occasion of his re-election as Director-General of the ILO. The Dutch Government wishes him all the wisdom in guiding the Organization through this period of great change in our world.

In that process, the special tripartite character of the ILO – with employers, workers and governments working together towards universal and lasting peace based upon social justice, as is stated in the preamble of the Constitution of 1919 – has been and will be in the future a rich source of inspiration. The Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944 reconfirmed the principles of 1919, adding the right of all people to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development, among other things.

In 1944 the Organization already recognized as one of the main goals of government the extension of social security measures to provide a basic income to all in need of such protection, as well as comprehensive medical care. This subject is still very important, as evidenced by the fact that this year's Report of the Director-General is devoted to social insurance and social protection. I will come back to this Report shortly.

In mentioning the two very important years in the existence of the ILO – 1919 and 1944 – we also realize that next year will be a very special one – 75 years since the founding of the Organization, and 50 years since the Declaration of Philadephia. We are presently examining the possibility, together with our partners in the Netherlands, of organizing a special tripartite conference in The Hague to commemorate the occasion.

And now, to come back to this year's Report, we find that the Director-General rightly underlines the importance of social insurance, in particular, and social protection, in general. However, what we would like to stress is that social security should be supplementary to employment activity. In our view it is essential for people to participate in the labour market, and that is why our first objective has to be the creation of jobs and the preservation of existing employment acitivities. We should also support persons who need, for the time being, social security benefits while they try to get back into work.

In this context I quote from the Report: "Governments have a fundamental responsiblity to ensure a basic standard of living for their people". We fully support this idea and in our opinion this should be done primarily by enabling workers to earn that basic standard themselves. These goals can be reached not only by individual incentives but also through more general measures of economic and social policy, aimed at increasing labour market participation.

In addition, governments have the responsibility to see to it that an adequate level of basic facilities is maintained, specifically in the area of minimum income and the maintenance of purchasing power. The promotion of labour participation has to be viewed in that context. There is a delicate balance between that adequate level on the one hand, and the incentives for the unemployed to accept a job on the other hand. It goes without saying that in cases where persons have no labour market prospects at all, there should always be adequate benefits. But in the case of those who are only temporarily in need of benefit, there obviously is tension between the level of the benefit and their interest in returning to the labour market.

We need a policy to stimulate people to return to gainful employment both for their own sake as well as to push back the number of persons receiving benefits.

In the beginning of my speech I referred to the Philadelphia principles that should inspire our policy-making. In Phildelphia we agreed that in cooperation with the ILO we should, among other things, work on the extension of social security measures to provide a basic income to all in need of such protection. The ILO Constitution also states that we have an obligation to achieve full employment to raise standards of living.

As I said before, in our view social security is supplementary to employment activity. First we have to create – and I quote the Declaration again – "the employment of workers in the occupations in which they can have the satisfaction of giving the fullest measure of their skill and attainments and make their greatest contribution to the common wellbeing".

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) – I have great pleasure in extending to all of you, personally and on behalf of the delegation of Turkish Employers, my best wishes for a very successful session and I congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to take this occasion to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Organization.

The twentieth century, which is drawing to a close, has witnessed many astonishing developments and achievements in a number of fields of human concern. But I have no doubt that one of the most impressive developments has taken place in social life, with the evolution of simple social insurance schemes into generalized systems of social security to begin with, and into comprehensive systems of social protection of late. No one can ignore or play down the meaning and importance of this evolution. However, it is deplorable to note that it has been confined to people living in industrial countries. We believe that in this context, the Director-General's Report will create a basis from which constructive ideas will emerge on how to meet the social security and protection needs of billions of people living in developing countries, without impairing their aspirations to higher levels of income and material wealth.

On the basis of the Report of the Director-General, I should like to dwell very briefly on existing social security practices in Turkey. In a way, this will be an exercise in self-criticism. Turkey needs to develop her social security and protection systems in terms of both coverage and hazards in spite of the existence of three social security systems. At present, only three-quarters of our population enjoy some sort of social insurance.

Our social security system has some major shortcomings and defects, among them problems arising from non-observance of basic principles such as lowering the retirement age and increasing the number of young pensioners. In addition, we have legislative problems, such as complications and confusion created by frequent amendments, and coverage problems, such as the absence of any kind of social security for the agricultural sector. Equally important is the financing model which leaves out the Government and therefore heavily increases the burden on employers and workers. The fact that the Government, while playing no role in financing, intervenes intensively in the management of the system is a further source of problems.

We are convinced as employers that the basic solution to the question of social protection lies in the capacity to create new employment, not only for Turkey but for a number of other countries which we know have similar problems. In our opinion, real social protection consists in providing human beings with jobs and occupations. Increasing unemployment throughout the world and including Europe can only be tackled through the creation of new job opportunities.

We also believe that in this connection, the ILO has an important role to play. First of all, it is necessary to implement ILO Recommendations so that labour legislation can become more flexible and resilient. It is a widely observed and recognized fact that in countries where social legislation is rigid the informal sector tends to grow, which means that there are more and more sectors of the population not covered by social protection. Unfortunately, this trend can also be observed in my country. I believe that the participation of the Government in the system is necessary by virtue of its "social character".

I have no doubt that an ILO Recommendation on this subject will be a most useful guideline. Furthermore, in the face of the increasing costs of the social security system, the non-participation of the Government leaves the employers and workers with enormous financial burdens. Therefore, an alleviation of this burden will create new investment opportunities which will contribute to the expansion of social protection.

I must emphasize our belief that social protection should in no way hinder the creation of new employment opportunities. In this connection, we feel that we need new ILO guidelines.

After having very briefly listed our problems and some of the solutions which our confederation thinks should be taken into consideration if our system is to provide a protective umbrella, I would like to emphasize our conviction that these problems can best be tackled in an atmosphere of tripartism. This explains the importance we place on social dialogue and cohesion. We are confident that with the economic and social council which will soon to be set up in our country, we shall be in a much better position to address these issues.

As the Director-General correctly points out in his Report, access to social protection has become a basic human right as well as a measure of human welfare. The problem is how to ensure that this basic human right is enjoyed by everyone in the world, irrespective of their race, colour, religion, age and sex and not just the privilege of people living in industrialized countries who account for a mere one-fifth of the world population, if that.

Briefly, in developing countries, the general poverty, the sheer size of the informal sector and numerous individual and institutional deficiencies, all militate against the extension of social security schemes. In these countries this issue should be seen and tackled as part and parcel of economic, political and social development. The apparent conflict between economic and social objectives can only be resolved through increased efforts and cooperation which should involve not only the social partners and governments of individual countries but should also take advantage of the supervision and expertise of such international organizations as the ILO. As Turkish employers, we wholeheartedly support the Director-General's invitation for cooperation to promote wider coverage and better benefits.

In all our efforts towards achieving this goal we should bear in mind that unless we can strike a proper balance between our economic aspirations and social goals, we face the risk of either slowing down development or increasing social injustices and insecurities.

Before I conclude, I would like to draw your attention to the deplorable act of hostility and discrimination which was carried out against foreigners in Solingen, Germany, a few days ago, where five Turks were killed in an arson attack. We believe that it is high time to put an end to such acts. We also hope that the necessary intervention will be made by all countries, especially by those in Europe to stop the brutal war in Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as the meaningless war carried out by Karabakh against Azerbaijan. To conclude, I would like to express before your distinguished gathering that as Turkish employers we firmly believe in complete social security and protection for all human beings and a peaceful world.

Original Spanish: Mr. VERA (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) – May I be allowed to join the preceding speakers and express, on behalf of the delegation of the workers of Venezuela, our most cordial congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents on their election.

We wish also to join in the congratulations which have been so warmly expressed to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the interesting Report he has submitted for our consideration, and we would like to express our firm support for the way in which the ILO has supported the democratic process of Venezuela at a time when it was experiencing a serious crisis. This solidarity was expressed not only in the words and actual presence of the Director-General and of other officials but in the concrete form of programmes and activities carried out by the Bureau for Workers' Activities and the Workers' Education programme.

It is with satisfaction that we can announce that Venezuelan democracy, with the decisive help of the organized workers, has successfully overcome a hard test, a proof of the firm conviction of the people that our major economic and social problems must be faced within democracy.

In Latin America the great majority of the population are excluded from the various social security schemes and the very few who do get support benefit only to an insufficient degree. The social security institutions which exist in our countries have not even been capable of carrying out efficiently the incipient social measures established in the structural readjustment programmes.

In some cases, in Venezuela, the absence of any real mechanism for the distribution of wealth, the loss of the sense of solidarity and social responsibility, and the still prevailing neo-liberal theories which claim to privatize even the right to life, threaten to trample underfoot the achievements of so many years of struggle by the trade union movement.

Our compulsory Social Security Institute, which is being reorganized, provides a minimum single network of social assistance for workers at the lowest scale of the labour market. This Institute is now on the verge of collapse and needs urgent and responsible help and solidarity from the Government, the employers and the workers.

With respect to retirement and unemployment protection, we the workers have achieved, in addition to some sectoral pension plans, a mechanism which, although perfect, constitutes our only and unrenounceable compensation, the payment of social benefits as acquired rights, whatever the reason for termination of the labour contract. This payment is linked to years of service and each year of work is paid on the basis of the amount of the last salary received.

This claim, it would seem, does not tally with the readjustment package. It has been attacked in the courts, in the legislature, in the communication media as well and through the representative spokesman of the oligarchic groups.

We would like to state before this great international social forum that when the day comes on which there is clear willingness on the part of the employers and the Government to negotiate and when we are given feasible and reasonable alternatives for protecting the unemployed and retired workers, then we shall be able to negotiate. But nobody will make us accept the deterioration of present conditions.

We understand that social security systems have to be adapted to societies and to their economic transformation. But the response cannot be a dismantling of the system; the only recourse cannot be sacrosanct privatization, a trend of the reforms under the readjustment programmes which propose a drastic reduction in public expenditure.

If each day there is less full-time and duly protected work in the industrialized world, and if there is an ever-increasing informal sector in the underdeveloped world, social security systems cannot be directly linked to employment conceived in the traditional manner. If we do not break this link between labour and social security, we will be condemning the great majority of the population to continued exclusion from assistance – the assistance which any human being deserves. That is why we feel that the privatization of basic social security management is wrong. We do not think that the logic of profit should be the one to dictate the behaviour of the agencies dealing with social security. We must seek systems which are adapted to the realities and specific situations of each nation, whether they be joint or totally public schemes. They must help the critical level of poverty, protect the most impoverished sectors of society, displaced through readjustments, and must provide efficient care for the workers and the whole population. In short, they must be systems which promote well-being and development.

The 13th Conference of American States Members of the ILO, held in Caracas last year, represented a considerable effort along these lines, an effort which we salute and for which we wish to thank the International Labour Organization. Although we regret that it was not possible to achieve the agreements which we had hoped for, it was an invaluable experience which endowed the trade union leaders of the region with the necessary means to seek fair and efficient social security systems and opened up the door for future tripartite negotiations.

Social security is facing new challenges with the globalization of the economy at a time when its cost is being placed alongside that of wages and other working conditions as comparative advantages. But we object to having wages and conditions of work and life seen to be part of international trade competitivity. For this reason, we disagree with the views of some governments which consider that the provisions which bind the countries signing trade and integration agreements to respect labour and trade union rights are a new and sophisticated form of protectionism.

Protectionism, which entailed losses higher than $40 billion for the developing countries, was not exactly based on the defence of the rights of the workers.

We have no doubt that there are those who seek to use the social clauses of trade agreements with protectionist purposes, but it is even more aberrant we feel to object to this type of mechanism with a view to perpetuating poverty and slavery, fostering a type of trade which will only be of benefit to capital.

We therefore support the initiative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions to include a social clause within the GATT negotiations. And we support the efforts of the Director-General to establish within the ILO a working group with a mandate to study these matters and enable effective action to be taken by the Organization to achieve the adoption of this type of social protection instrument within trade and integration agreements.

Universal access to basic health care, fair compensation in the event of illness, accident, invalidity and maternity, the establishment of pension systems enabling the workers to live a decent life and protection for unemployment and protection of the family are all indispensable objectives of the trade union movement.

The struggle for social security is a struggle for life and dignity. It is a struggle to save human nature and to promote solidarity with other human beings.

The Confederation of Workers of Venezuela hopes that there will be a genuinely democratic, fair and egalitarian society. An indispensable prerequisite for such a society is the establishment of an effective social security system.

Mr. VODICKA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czech Republic) – On behalf of the Government of the Czech Republic and on my own behalf, I have the honour to congratulate the President of this session of the International Labour Conference on his election.

It is a pleasure for me to address the 80th Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization, the highest and the most representative body of this Organization. On behalf of the Government of the Czech Republic, I hope that its proceedings will be successful and all its tasks and expectations fulfilled.

It is evident from the Director-General's Report Activities of the ILO, 1992 what enormous and invaluable efforts of every kind this Organization makes in all parts of the world to achieve the goals declared in its Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and more than 350 Conventions and Recommendations. Alleviation of poverty, the sustainable growth of living standards, the protection of human dignity, fundamental human rights and freedoms surely represent main priorities.

I would like to express on behalf of my Government the hope that the organizational reform recently launched in the ILO will contribute within the framework of the "active partnership" policy to enable the ILO's constituents to solve serious social and economic problems.

The second Director-General's Report Social insurance and social protection also deserves to be appreciated for its very comprehensive and professional survey of developments generally and of various regions in particular.

It confirms that the measures of social reform we have taken in the Czech Republic have been sound. Technical assistance from the International Labour Organization and from several industrialized countries has played an important role within this process.

Our social policy has two main objectives for the period of transformation.

Firstly, to diminish the possible negative social impacts of economic reform and, at the same time, to correct step by step all the negative aspects of the previous system and, secondly, to create a quite new understanding of social policy.

In its Programme Declaration the Government of the Czech Republic chose as one of its main priorities social policy, stating that social policy and the maintenance of social peace are prerequisites of successful transformation. Social policy thus fulfils a special preventive role and contributes to human and political feasibility of our economic reforms.

The preventive role of social policy consists in finding a balanced state of social stratification and social redistribution so that resulting social differences are still a motivating factor, although they are not a source of social tension and conflicts. This preventive role is reflected in all three relatively independent schemes of social policy which the Czech Government intends to establish and gradually improve.

These are, firstly, social insurance, secondly, state social support, and, thirdly, social aid or assistance.

We consider the first one to be socially and economically the most important factor for stabilization. We have already introduced the generally widespread principle of financing through contributions paid by both employers and workers with the participation and guarantee of the State. Now we are seeking to develop the most effective complementary pension and injury insurance schemes.

As regards state social support, this will be focused mainly on families with children.

The system of social aid or assistance should be the most important instrument of social prevention because its task is to provide necessary social assistance to those citizens who are unable to ensure for themselves basic means of subsistence. It helps an individual to regain a position of social independence and sovereignty in which he is able to take care of himself. This approach is designed to prevent the maintenance of poverty and social parasitism. Under the new conditions, not the State but communities and regions will have to deal with such phenomena as unemployment and poverty. Therefore they need to be strengthened, in the interest of social prevention.

The main goal of the "Social safety net" introduced in our country in 1991 is the protection of the labour force and its speedy return to and insertion in the labour market. I have to stress that proactive employment policy is one of the integral parts of our social policy concept.

I would like to say that standing tripartite negotiations and transparent government policy towards the social partners and all the population successfully contribute to the fact that the level of social acceptability of continuing economic reform has not been exceeded and no serious social conflicts have occurred in the last three years.

As regards this unique Organization, we believe that the newly structured ILO will increase its international prestige. We wish the Organization and its Director-General much success in this effort.

Mr. THANESUEN (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – It is indeed the greatest honour for us, delegates from the Employers' Confederation of Thailand (ECOT) to have the great opportunity to attend this distinguished gathering, and it is a great pleasure for myself for being allowed to deliver this message.

I would like to take this opportunity to inform you that the Employers' Confederation of Thailand has been in operation for almost 17 years since its inception in 1976. Ever since, it has played a vital role in the strengthening of good relationships and cooperation among various groups of employers, workers' organizations, and government agencies, as well as between employers and workers.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand believes that smooth relationships and good understanding among these social groups is vital to the development of private investment and industry in Thailand, and consequently to progress in social and economic development, including the fair and proper contributions from and benefits to the social groups.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand, therefore, will continue to pursue these important objectives.

I would like to take a moment to inform the honourable delegates and distinguished guests about the present situation in our country.

First, the political situation. The elected Government has been in office for seven months since the last general election and after the last political crisis. Although the present Government is a coalition, it is believed that it will last and be improved.

Secondly, the economic situation. Although private investment was briefly interrupted by the worldwide recession and by our internal political problems, the ruling Government has made great efforts to maintain internal stability and to promote private investment. As a result, the private investment index climbed steadily from 86 in the middle of 1991 to about 95 in early 1993. For the economy as a whole, we expect a growth rate of about 7.5 per cent in 1993. This is quite low compared to the rate of 11-12 per cent per annum during 1988-90, but still quite attractive compared to the rest of the world.

Third and last, I would like to point out that Thailand is becoming a new financial centre in the Southeast Asian region. Toward this objective, the Government has revised the laws and regulations, adopted the standards of the Bank for International Settlement and established the Bangkok International Banking Facilities in 1992.

I could go on and on, but in the interest of time I should like to conclude by saying that Thailand remains an attractive destination for investment and for tourists. I invite you to visit Thailand. It will be a great honour for us to be your information and business centre. Please do not hesitate to contact us. All of you are welcome in Thailand.

Original Japanese: Mr. ITOH (Workers' delegate, Japan) – It is a great honour for me and for the Japanese Trade Union Confederation to take part in the discussion here today on behalf of the workers of Japan. I would like to express my wholehearted congratulations to Mr. Abdel-Hak, the Minister of Manpower and Training of Egypt, on his election to the presidency of the Conference.

The world has undergone dramatic changes in the recent past. There will be more drastic changes as we approach the next century. When the world undergoes drastic and rapid changes it brings more difficulties to the developing countries and their people, as well as to all workers all over the world.

Therefore, bearing in mind these difficulties, I call on all delegates gathered here to be ready to cope with these problems.

The end of the cold war between the Eastern and Western blocs has brought an end to the terrible fear of worldwide war. On the other hand, we failed to eradicate regional conflicts that we had expected also to come to an end. On the contrary, they are now increasing. Moreover, confusion and hardship continue in countries striving for the transition from the socialist economy to the market economy.

Because of these difficulties, we are now witnessing famine, poverty and violations of basic human and trade union rights in Asia, Africa and Latin America. We observe also that similar difficulties are arising in Eastern Europe, provoking a new problem of economic refugees.

On the other hand, there are also positive developments. It is a great pleasure that apartheid in South Africa is nearing its end. The Japanese Trade Union Confederation has been supporting the democratic movements and trade unions in South Africa. We must continue our efforts until apartheid is completely abolished and a non-racial democratic government is established through peaceful and democratic means.

As you know, the aims of the ILO are to eradicate poverty, famine and racial discrimination all over the world with the establishment of full respect for basic human and trade union rights and democracy. Through its contribution to eradicating poverty and democratization, the ILO also contributes to eradicating military conflicts, as well as human and environmental tragedies.

The ILO will mark its 75th anniversary next year. The ILO has been working to create a peaceful and comfortable living environment not only for mankind but also for the fauna and the flora on this planet. With the end of the cold war, we should reinvigorate our determination and passion to make our best efforts to realize the aims and ideals of the ILO.

I would like to propose three areas of ILO activities for the consideration of the delegates and of the ILO.

First, in relation to the 75th anniversary next year, I would like to express my opinion. Today, the world faces many difficulties and tasks that I tried to describe above. It is very urgent to improve living conditions in developing countries and the least developed countries. The ILO should contribute more actively to the creation of productive employment, to establish social security systems and to expand compulsory education and school lunches in order to abolish child labour. It should contribute to other work that will improve positively the living conditions of peoples of developing countries, and also contribute to their future development. We should, therefore, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO review past activities and encourage discussions on new initiatives so that we can more effectively achieve the basic ideals and philosophies of the Organization.

Second, in this respect, I would express my sincere thanks to the Director-General for his Report, which addresses the problem of establishing social security systems in developing countries as an important task. I believe the ILO should intensify its activities to solve the various problems noted in the Report which hamper the establishment of social security in these countries. I would also like to raise one problem that is not covered in detail in the Report. That is the problem of social security for foreign workers. In Japan we have approximately 200,000 foreign workers and about 300,000 illegal workers, in addition to about 800,000 Korean and Chinese residents. Similarly, several hundred thousand Japanese live in foreign countries, working for Japanese and foreign companies. The ILO should work more to harmonize standards on social security and especially to expand the portability of pension schemes and other benefits across borders. In the face of the increasing number of such workers, ILO action in this area should also be re-examined.

Thirdly, in relation to my first point, I must stress the vital necessity to expand technical cooperation both qualitatively and quantitatively. This does not mean that the ILO's core mandates, such as the setting, application and the control of application of standards should be weakened. If this should happen, the Japanese trade unions would oppose it by all possible means.

We hear a number of voices demanding more technical cooperation, but the financing of technical cooperation is not stable because a large portion of these financial resources come from voluntary contributions from the governments. It seems that expenditure for technical cooperation constitutes only about 10 per cent of the regular budget. In this regard, I appreciate very much the active technical cooperation of the Nordic countries. On the other hand, it is regrettable that some developed countries are not so active in the ILO's technical cooperation activities. Therefore I propose that the ILO should study other possible ways to secure necessary financial resources for technical cooperation, which is expected to expand greatly in coming years.

Finally, I would like to conclude my speech by expressing my sincere hope that the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference will live up to its responsibilities in a way that would respond to the expectations of workers all over the world.

Mr. BERGE (Minister of Local Government and Labour, Norway) – I am honoured to have this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference for the first time. We would like to congratulate the President upon his election to this important position. We feel certain that he will guide us safely through our proceedings and our agenda. The main theme for this session of the Conference, Social insurance and social protection is most relevant and important. The Director-General deserves great credit for having produced an outstanding report to inspire and guide our work. The social security system is essential for maintaining income security in situations such as unemployment, sickness, disability or old age. However, the maintenance and development of social security systems cannot be seen in isolation from income generation, employment and economic growth.

The high and increasing unemployment in a majority of countries is one of the principal challenges for governments and for the social partners. If this negative development is allowed to continue it will undermine both the standard of living and social security and will become a threat to the democratic development of countries. The struggle against unemployment must therefore be given the highest priority by all governments. For the major international organizations as well, particularly for the ILO, the fight against unemployment will of course be a main task in the years to come.

My Government is following a common strategy for unemployment and the vocationally disabled. This strategy may be called a strategy for work, because work and active labour market measures are given priority over the mere passive receipt of economic benefits. We are now in the process of implementing a new policy on ill-health and disability, giving increased emphasis on active measures for vocational rehabilitation, combined with a more stringent approach to the award of disability benefits.

The labour market measures aim at reducing the effects of unemployment and increasing the possibilities of the unemployed to obtain ordinary work. Today, with important structural problems in the labour market, training programmes are given high priority. In Norway this policy has given nearly 40 per cent of jobseekers an engagement in labour market schemes, most of them aiming to improve their qualifications.

In a situation with an increasing number of long-term unemployed there is also a growing need for temporary employment measures. We are therefore in the process of launching a new temporary employment measure in Norway. This measure is aimed to give temporary work, especially for the long-term unemployed in the municipal sector. We have also introduced a labour market scheme that combines the need for training and work practice for the unemployed with the possibility of employers providing training for employees. In this scheme, called "training substitutes", the unemployed are training to work as substitutes, while employees are given leave for training.

In April 1992 the Government of Norway presented a report to Parliament on vocational rehabilitation and work for disabled persons, sickness benefits and disability benefits. The report was prepared in order to develop a coherent policy on the current trends of expulsion and exclusion from the labour market due to ill-health and disability.

The background for the development of this policy document is an alarming increase over the last decade in the number of persons of working age receiving disability pensions or sickness benefits from national insurance.

The strategies outlined in the report, which are now being followed up by appropriate legislation, consist of a two-handed approach where on the one hand the medical criteria for receipt of disability pensions and sickness benefits are defined more restrictively and on the other hand increased emphasis is given to vocational rehabilitation. Work and active rehabilitation measures are to be the first choice, instead of passive transfers of social security benefits.

The responsibility of employers to provide vocational rehabilitation measures for their own employees will also be more clearly defined, in that employers are now required to prepare a plan for rehabilitation for employees on long-term sick leave.

As pointed out in the Report, public social protection measures are very limited for the vast majority in developing countries. Limited government budgets do not allow social schemes covering the whole population. The small formal sector also limits the relevance of schemes based on formal employment. In many traditional societies well-established systems within the family and the local community ensure care even for the weakest. Such traditional structures are, however, being uprooted by modern development. This happens at the same time as economic setbacks limit governments' ability to compensate through public schemes.

There seems today to be widespread agreement that no country can achieve sustainable development without including the poorest part of the population in the process. Reports from UNDP and the World Bank underline this view very clearly.

Recent initiatives in some developing countries have shown, however, that a lot can be done to secure basic services and basic social protection in countries with very limited resources. Programmes to extend health services to all through greater community involvement, both in management and funding, have proved quite successful, but the condition for success is that special measures for the poorest should be built into the programmes. Various labour-intensive schemes, based partly on selection of workers by the local community in acordance with needs, have also proved effective. The viability of such schemes may, however, sometimes be questioned.

Through our development aid budget, my Government is supporting such programmes and schemes in developing countries. Multilateral agencies, among them the ILO, are important channels for Norwegian assistance to promote social protection for the broad population in poorer countries.

I would like to take this opportunity to encourage the ILO to continue its efforts to develop innovative schemes and work out methods to secure social protection for poorer groups in developing countries. Such efforts could be based on closer cooperation with larger agencies such as UNDP and the World Bank.

Original French: Mr. GIRAUD (Minister of Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, France) – Permit me to congratulate the President on his accession to such high office. Permit me also to express my pleasure of the re-election of Mr. Michel Hansenne as Director-General. Mr. Hansenne, as he well knows, enjoys the full confidence of the Government of France.

For a Minister who represents an administration which has been in office for only two months, to participate even briefly in the work of this Conference is a special privilege, an opportunity to assess the work accomplished by the International Labour Organization and to learn about the contribution it is capable of making to the world of labour. An opportunity to appreciate the spirit and the philosophy underlying its efforts.

The preamble of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization affirms that a universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice. In referring to labour conditions which give rise to injustice, poverty and deprivation, it reminds us in very simple and concrete terms that an improvement is urgently required.

This approach is shared by my Government, based on a school of thought in which the expression of social justice is conditioned by the will for reform.

At the present time, the victory of democracy over totalitarianism is gradually countering the idea of bringing about heaven on earth, an idea which is fine in theory but which is so tragically harmful in its application. Our Organization has done and will continue to do its share in this struggle. My country will do likewise.

Indeed we have to continue along this path. Rather than trying to impose the best of all possible worlds, let us devote our energy to making this a better world.

To do this, it is vital to rationalize our activities and to identify priorities.

In this respect, I have noted with satisfaction that the programme and budget proposals for the biennium 1994-95 take full account of the changes of method in the planning of ILO activities in the field and at headquarters, by means of a considerable transfer of resources towards priority programmes.

The reforms to the Conference and those which are under consideration for the Governing Body aim at improving efficiency and at a better utilization of budget resources.

I have noted with great interest the reports prepared for this session of the Conference.

The Director-General's arguments on social protection are very convincing. In my country the general structure and basic rules of social protection were established by General De Gaulle.

France, like many other countries, is experiencing a difficult economic situation.

This means that social protection plays a vital role. Nevertheless, social protection, however vital, is not enough to guarantee to all a minimum acceptable living standard: an additional effort of civic solidarity is necessary.

It is also necessary to preserve the right to work, which represents the foundation of human dignity.

The agenda of our Conference includes a debate on the ILO's technical cooperation activities.

The Conference's welcome adoption in 1987 of a resolution requires it, every five years, to conduct a global examination of the Organization's technical cooperation activities.

The excellent report which you have before you in this respect is timely in mentioning all of the consequences of the new modalities for multilateral technical cooperation within the United Nations system. I fully endorse the active partnership policy and the development of multidisciplinary teams.

I welcome the stature which the Turin Training Centre has acquired over the years, and the message of congratulations addressed to it by the Secretary-General of the United Nations during his visit.

Thus, the agenda of our Conference perfectly reflects the varied activities of the ILO and its pragmatic approach.

However, I do wonder about the priorities which we should favour.

Should we continue to develop, year after year, new and increasingly complex standards? Should we not react to the insufficient number of ratifications which have been recorded, particularly in the developing countries?

Here is an important risk, that the two major activities of the ILO might eventually be perceived separately.

On the one hand there would be the complex texts of standards which have been drawn up in the light of the situation in the industrialized countries, and on the other hand there would be technical cooperation for the countries of the Third World. I know that is not what we want to see happen, but there is the risk of such a split. To my mind, the three component parts of the International Labour Conference should keep in mind the fact that they are legislating for the 165 member States, and not just for the few of them.

In this respect, the opinion recently handed down by the Court of Justice of the European Community on the subject of an ILO Convention may help to clarify matters. It does not superimpose the Community's position over that of the ILO.

In the imposing set of standards prepared by the Organization we can distinguish Conventions which relate to the fundamental human rights and tripartism.

The Director-General in his Report presents the stature for ratification of 12 of these standards.

These texts, generally speaking, have garnered a significant but, on the whole, insufficient number of ratifications.

I think that membership of the ILO and adherence to its objectives implies that all member States should ratify and apply the major principles of human rights to the field of labour, regardless of a country's level of economic development.

Amongst these principles there are four I would like to highlight: freedom of association, the abolition of forced labour, non-discrimination in employment and the minimum age for admission to employment.

Can we admit a situation in which a member State of our Organization refuses to ratify all or some of these essential Conventions?

Thus, on behalf of my Government, I would like to request the Director-General to propose measures which would give an absolute priority to the concern which I have just expressed.

The member States which have not yet manifested their adherence to these commitments, which embody the very essence of the ILO, should be publicly and urgently called upon to do so.

To ratify and apply these standards is an essential duty for a member State of the ILO, not only with respect to its own workers, but with respect to the world of labour as a whole.

I should simply like to refer, in conclusion, to the preamble of the Constitution: "The failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries".

This message, which seems so relevant, dates from 1919. The world has now been freed from its vain ideological disputes. Is this not the time, on the eve of the 75th anniversary of our Organization, to do everything possible to realize our ideals?

Original Spanish: Mr. EURNEKIAN (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Argentina) – On behalf of the employers of Argentina it is my honour to address this Conference and to congratulate the President on his election.

I should also like to emphasize and express my gratitude for the cordial welcome given by this distinguished audience to the visit of Mr. Carlos Menem, President of my country.

I should also like to praise the Report of Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Organization, and I should like to say that his approach to the role of ILO technical cooperation is very constructive for the development of countries and their economic and social progress.

At the world level efforts have been deployed by efforts of the international organizations to correct the problems of a planet undergoing far-reaching changes.

However, there are too many countries where poverty and destitution, underemployment, unemployment and a lack of growth and development of the productive sectors still prevail.

This lack of growth aggravates the crisis because young people are not being integrated into the labour market. This makes the principles of the Constitution of the ILO of 1919, and the Declaration of Philadelphia all the more valid today.

The Members of our Organization must carry out an in-depth and realistic examination of the objectives and fundamental projects of the ILO. Today we are faced with a new challenge, a challenge to implement structural adjustment within a framework of economic growth, development, employment creation and the genuine implementation of social rights.

Let us remember that social reform must be carried out alongside and simultaneously with economic reform. Only thus will there be a true defence of the rights of the workers and a corresponding growth of the productive sectors.

Today it is even more important for the ILO to assume its responsibility. Technical cooperation is the best and most effective means of contributing to the harmonization of economic policies with the interests of world labour.

The development of human resources is viable only in an environment of the wealth of nations.

Argentina, within this world-wide picture, can be recognized today as a developing country. For the first time in recent decades we have a combination of political and economic stability. This has led to the consolidation of democracy and an incipient process of economic transformation.

Argentina has responsibly assumed the priority of joining the newly developed countries of the world. The potential achievements of this policy are the opening up of the economy and the globalization of markets, the process of privatization and the deregulation of the State.

However, there remains the so-called Argentinian cost. This is a product of excessive regulations, inadequate legislation, demagogical policies, bureaucracy and the lack of flexible labour and social security laws. This reality hampers productivity and efficiency because it conspires against the worker himself by not generating employment or stimulating the development of productive sectors.

Our Government undoubtedly has the political will and capacity to carry out these changes. It is absolutely necessary to achieve productivity and the necessary competitivity to adapt our country to the globalization of markets. Without this, our economies will never be efficient and thus there will be neither investment nor growth nor employment. We are sure that our country can achieve these goals.

To become part once again of the developed world implies prosperity for our workers and our enterprises. It means prosperity for all. The path is arduous; the cleavage between reality and standards is deep. Obstacles are not only legislative but cultural. But Argentina is adapting to the new era and circumstances of the world.

Employers and workers must cooperate together with the same conviction and spirit of constructive dialogue to carry out this unpostponable overall revision of labour legislation in general and social security legislation in particular.

To implement flexibility means to strive to generate more jobs, improve living conditions and achieve effective social security. It means generating productivity and true employment.

To address the subject of social security means accepting the technical challenge of one of the most important debates within the internal adjustment of our economic system.

We feel that the reform of social security at the legislative level will finally be guided in the right direction, enabling us to overcome the crisis in this area.

As the President of Argentina, Mr. Carlos Menem, said yesterday, we are working for the modernization of our economy within democracy, freedom and respect for human rights, with the participation – which is so important – of production and labour.

The participants are the small and medium-sized enterprises as well as the big ones which, through private initiative, will have the unquestionable role of generating wealth, which will guarantee the entry of Argentina into the new economic and social world order. However, the globalization of the economy brings to the forefront those three stereotypes: the developed countries, the underdeveloped countries and the developing ones.

In the developed countries, the theory of the free market coexists side by side with the protectionist reality.

In the underdeveloped countries, the growth of their economies is based on subsidies, stimulating productive sectors and protectionism.

The export of these realities harms the productive sectors of other countries, through the dumping effect.

In the developing countries, such as ours, the theory of the free market aims at becoming an economic reality.

Thus our products are marginalized in the markets by this new international context and hence too are our workers.

Hence the urgent need to establish at the domestic level the flexible labour policies and social security policies which are still pending and which will guarantee the true defence of the rights of the worker; at the international level, we need measures which will achieve the sustained growth of the economies of the developing countries as a genuine and true framework for world competitivity.

Times may change and economic theories may evolve, but the fundamental principle of our ILO does not change and will be accomplished only when we build a united world which guarantees the enhancement of man within social justice and freedom.

Mrs. PUHAR (Minister of Labour, Family and Social Affairs, Slovenia) – Before I make my contribution to the general discussion on the Report of the Director-General I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to these important posts. I express also our congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election.

The excellent Report of the Director-General has inspired me to present you with some data and information on Slovenia's innovative efforts to implement various social insurance schemes, as well as to ensure the material welfare of various vulnerable population groups.

Slovenia, both in the standards it has set and in actual fact, has a relatively high social standard of entitlements, measures and professional services. Most of the solutions characteristic of arrangements in the field of social insurance in European legislation, and above all in the countries of Central Europe, are also implemented in Slovenia. I am thinking here of old-age and disability insurance, health insurance and unemployment insurance. Because of the importance of the family and children in countries with an ageing population, we have already constructed a system of social security protection with family and old-age benefits and help in caring for children.

The deteriorating situation of the economy, which experienced a particularly powerful shock after independence and the war in the southern republics of the former State, has reduced the funds available to continue the provision of standards already achieved in the social policy field without any disruption. The economy is simultaneously undergoing a process of intensive restructuring, which is critical to making our country competitive and finding new markets. It is also undergoing the process of privatization of former state property and the denationalization of formerly nationalized property, as well as all the technical and technological changes characteristic of dynamic world development. All this put together is causing a fall in social production in Slovenia and a rise in the proportion of the GDP devoted to covering social entitlements.

The aspiration for a stable, non-inflationary economic system, and efforts to establish economic links with other, mainly European, economies are forcing our country to devote a larger proportion of the GDP, as well as of the state budget, to economic transformation. They are also encouraging economic development and rationalization of individual fields of social policy. We are setting as a goal that individuals must increase their contribution to their own social security.

The labour market is particularly problematic. With all the above-mentioned changes, there has been a loss of more than 200,000 jobs in four years, and unemployment has increased some fivefold and is today higher as a proportion of the active population than, for example, in the countries of the European Community (the level at the end of 1992 was 13.7 per cent).

The current system of setting financial compensation and assistance for unemployment and the long history of these entitlements discourage people from searching for new work. People who have been employed in companies which are continuing to stagnate and in which remuneration is dropping are gradually finding it more advantageous to receive financial assistance. Poor supervision of work and deficient penalty mechanisms make it possible to receive social benefits and at the same time to obtain income from contract forms of work, without taking up formal employment. We are tackling the problem of arranging these entitlements in a manner providing greater incentive, using a larger share of available resources for encouraging employment and for vocational training.

We have been restructuring entitlements under old-age and invalidity insurance over an extended period, precisely during the time of our greatest economic crisis. These benefits are the result of years of work and significant needs. During this period, the number of pensioners increased tremendously, from 250,000 to 450,000 in four years. This also to a large extent results from encouraging retirement during economic restructuring and during the transformation of companies. It also stems from the fact that, at a time of large financial losses among companies, retirement is very often a more sensible choice for individuals (the ratio between the active and passive population is already 1:1.7). We have succeeded this year in partially rationalizing the system. This is exceptionally expensive. Contributions place a heavy burden on the cost of labour (15.5 per cent contribution from employers and the same from employees), and there are periodic adjustments of benefits in accordance with the retail price index. We are planning additionally to revise this system, adapting to the legislation in other European countries.

Legislation in the field of social security has been adopted at various times by various administrative bodies and ministries and, in the last two years, also with a variety of orientations. This has created a situation in which it is possible for a person simultaneously to claim benefits under a number of laws and on a number of bases.

Consequently, we now must carry out a revision to achieve harmony. Harmonizing benefits from insurance and social security benefits must, in the circumstances of drastic changes in employment such as those occurring in Slovenia, be detached from the payment of remuneration because this takes place on an entirely independent basis and depends on actual processes within the economy and not just on the financial possibilities and tariff systems. This is especially important for retirement and disability schemes and for the employment system, where automatic linkage to actual earnings in the economy can place an excessive burden on the relevant funds or on the budget.

Harmonized social security benefits in Slovenia are for the moment already partially linked to the guaranteed minimum remuneration which is defined by the State for employees in companies and institutions. We will carry out a revision of benefits in the fields of social security and insurance in a number of phases, with harmonization and adjustments being carried out first to abolish inconsistencies. We will later integrate the systems more rationally.

In our work we will respect our obligations under Conventions to which we are party, and will observe the Recommendations of the International Labour Organization, as well as the European Social Charter and other documents on which existing social elements in market economies are based. Slovenia has decided that it wants an economically successful and socially just State and our efforts are oriented towards that goal.

I cannot describe here all the other characteristics and events which are accompanying the social and economic transformation of our State. Permit me, though, to mention the aspiration to institutionalize a social partnership and a social pact. Negotiations on this matter are currently taking place. Important changes are also occurring in the field of the organization and activities of trade unions and in the field of the activities of employers' associations.

Membership in the International Labour Organization has enabled us to gain new information, to exchange our experiences and to obtain help in resolving specific questions. I am sure that the International Labour Organization will continue to provide important support for Slovenia's efforts to protect and arrange the legal and material position of the workers and inhabitants of Slovenia in a rational way and with the aim of greater stimulation of further development.

Original Spanish: Mr. MONGE RODRIGUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica) – On behalf of the Government and people of Costa Rica, I wish to congratulate the President on his well-deserved appointment to that office and to offer my best wishes for the success of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, whose purpose is to guide our countries towards social justice and development.

I am pleased to inform you that the Government of Costa Rica has been engaged since May 1991 in a process of reform and updating of labour and social legislation, in which we have benefited from the ongoing and unstinting cooperation of the International Labour Office. When we embarked on the process, the Ministry of which I was in charge requested the Director-General for technical advice on the drafting of standards for protection against anti-trade-union discrimination and on providing more scope for the development of trade union activities.

The request for the Office's assistance resulted in three missions by distinguished consultants and staff experts from ILO's headquarters in Geneva, who prepared the broad lines of the future legislation on trade union guarantees. In July of this year an eminent consultant will be visiting San José to put the finishing touches to the draft of this extremely important standard-setting instrument, which will add a welcome dimension to national legislation, providing for the full exercise of the fundamental right of freedom of association, which is a basic feature of our institutional and political system.

Other draft laws have also been submitted for advice to the appropriate units of the International Labour Office here in Geneva, for example those rescinding legislation against strikes in the public sector, updating the system of fines for infringement of labour legislation, creating machinery for the settlement of disputes and for collective bargaining and strikes in the public sector, and converting redundancy assistance into a right. In response to this request for advice, observations were received last month that will enable us to bring our regulations into line with international labour standards.

I also wish to draw attention to the mediatory role between the social partners played by the High Labour Council, a tripartite advisory body set up by a decree of our President, Rafael Angel Calderón Fournier, on 5 August 1991. It brings together top representatives of trade unions, employers' organizations, and the Ministries of Planning, Finance and Labour with a view to analysing and taking decisions, by consensus, on the most important social and economic issues facing the country on the basis of an agenda agreed by the parties concerned. The work of this Labour Council has had a palpable impact on the prevailing climate of social balance and has led to a marked decrease in labour conflicts.

My Government would also like to share with this meeting its pleasure with respect to the progress that has been made in Parliament in the process of ratification of an important group of Conventions submitted to it last February. Among these, special mention should be made of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), which has already been approved in a special committee.

Since the Administration of President Calderón came to power in May 1990, important steps have been taken in the legislative field, designed to repeal sections 333 and 334 of the Penal Code under which it was an offence to take part in strikes in the public services or to encourage such stoppages.

This Government has taken a political decision, in accordance with what is advocated in comparative legislation in the legal doctrine, to pinpoint the shortcomings of the exercise of collective rights of workers in labour law, excluding from our legislation penal sanctions which correspond to de facto regimes rather than to a legal system such as that in operation in Costa Rica. I am pleased to announce that the Bill submitted to the Legislature, along these lines, was approved at its first reading on Friday, 28 May, and is about to become part of the Republic's legislation.

The Director-General in his Report quite rightly alludes to the historical development, characteristics and regional peculiarities of social security systems which are a highly topical subject in view of the structural changes and the various expectations and social programmes which have resulted from the policies of economic restructuring which are so popular today.

The Director-General has rightly pointed out how inappropriate it is to copy the systems of developed countries in developing countries. He also emphasizes the importance of the management and effective and efficient administration of the different social security systems.

My Government would like to stress its appreciation of the Director-General's statement that a balance must be found between the negative influence of economic requirements with regard to social expenditure on the one hand and the repercussions of social adjustment on the ability of the social security systems to guarantee an appropriate level of protection on the other.

I am sure that our countries are aware of the important role of the ILO in this field through standard-setting and technical support given to its Members, and that we are seeking ways to reduce poverty through social security.

Costa Rica will, next August, be celebrating the 50th anniversary of the enactment of Social Guarantees and the Labour Code by the Government of Dr. Rafael Angel Calderón Guardia, father of our present leader, Rafael Angel Calderón Fournier.

Social legislation has helped Costa Rica in this period to enjoy justice and harmony between capital and labour and this has contributed to peace and an absence of social upheavals. Today, the decisive challenge facing us is to bring our legislation up to date without undermining any of our basic principles, to modernize our labour laws so that we do not fall behind the requirements of the twenty-first century which is only a few years away.

I would once again like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report and reiterate the gratitude of the Government of Costa Rica for the excellent work being carried out by the ILO to foster and ensure that the development and adjustment processes under way in our nations go hand in hand with mechanisms and programmes guaranteeing the existence of a model of social justice which is so very important, in terms of an economic model.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Eleventh sitting

Tuesday, 8 June 1993, 3.30 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Badey and Mr. Tabani

FIRST REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – The first item on our agenda is the first Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I call on Mr. Chotard, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee to submit the report.

Original French: Mr. CHOTARD (Government delegate, France; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to you the First Report of the Finance Committee (published in Provisional Record No. 4A) in which a resolution is submitted authorizing Romania to participate in the vote.

The Finance Committee has adopted a resolution. Taking account of the financial measures adopted by the Conference in 1990 regarding the payment of arrears and, moreover and in particular, of the fact that Romania had brought its payments up to date on 5 February 1993 by settling the amount outstanding from 1992, it is proposed that, in conformity with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, Romania should be given authorization to participate in the vote.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – If no one wishes to take the floor, we may consider that the report is now before the Conference and that we have adopted the report itself, that is paragraphs 1 to 14, as well as the resolution which is appended to the report.

(The report, paragraphs 1 to 14, is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO ROMANIA OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – Adoption of the resolution concerning the granting to Romania of permission to vote, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, requires a two-thirds majority, in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 19 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. This should be a record vote. However, since the delay in the payment of Romania's contribution was not significant, yesterday I submitted to the Conference on behalf of the Officers and in accordance with article 76 of the Standing Orders a unanimous proposal aimed at suspending article 19, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders and proposing that we adopt this resolution by consensus.

If there are no objections I shall take it that this proposal is adopted.

(The proposal is adopted.)

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – We now move to the adoption of the resolution itself. If there are no objections I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – We shall now continue our discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. E. RODRIGUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) – I should like to begin my statement by congratulating the President on his election and the Director-General on the theme selected for his Report to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Social security and social protection schemes in member States have changed substantially since the Second World War.

Today they are complex systems characterized by a greater degree of solidarity between the young and the elderly, the employed and the unemployed, the healthy and the sick, as the Director-General rightly points out.

The Government of my country, which took office in 1989, has accorded particular importance to the questions of social security and the modernization of the industrial relations system.

In order to implement a social protection system we first had to stabilize the economy and to put an end to inflation, which is basically a tax on poverty that destroys any type of social security system.

Then it was necessary to deal with the problem of employment, without which it is impossible to think seriously of any effective social security.

This year we introduced an extensive and intensive social plan which is designed to create jobs, reconstruct the health services, extend them to all our elderly and provide unemployment insurance for unemployed workers.

We are introducing a reform of the benefits system in various stages and modernizing our labour relations system.

Looked at as a whole, both initiatives are designed to increase savings investment with a view to increasing employment and improving the necessary link between the productivity of the economy, labour productivity and workers' incomes.

The current social security legislation has become a bottomless financial pit. In our country, expenditure in this respect rose from 3.3 per cent of the GDP in 1977 to 7.1 per cent in 1992 without in any way solving the structural problems of the system nor providing benefits to retired persons and pensioners.

Our Government decided on a total reorganization of the social security system which is now being adopted by Parliament, by combining action by the private and state sectors.

The workers' contribution of 11 per cent will be administered by pension and retirement benefits bodies, be they private or public, as selected by each and every worker.

The employers' contribution, which as in the present scheme will be 16 per cent, will be administered exclusively by the State in a system of redistribution on behalf of the less well off.

The new system means that the savings of the workers will ensure the payment of just benefits at the time of their retirement; but at the same time the investment of these savings will enable us to generate new employment which will benefit those workers who are still active.

In the preliminary bill on the modernization of industrial relations which has been proposed to Parliament and the social actors in a draft text before the adoption of a final version, the Government sets forth a thoroughgoing reform which calls for the regulation of part-time work, an item which we find on the agenda of this very session.

Part-time work is designed to promote employment in sectors of the population at present outside the labour market, such as women and young people; but such contracts also provide the employer with the opportunity of recruiting workers for precisely the necessary period of time.

Part-time work began to be introduced in the industrialized countries at a time when there were demands from trade unions for more free time and a better distribution of available jobs.

For example, in France in 1982, when the workweek was reduced to 39 hours, employers were exempted from social contributions in respect of the young workers they recruited.

In Italy the objective of these reductions in hours of work was to prevent the collective dismissal of workers.

Workers who are recruited in this way will have the same individual and collective rights as those accorded to full-time workers.

Social contributions will be based on the amount of time actually worked and remuneration and other economic benefits will be calculated on a proportional basis as prescribed by law or the collective agreement applicable to full-time workers.

The Director-General, in his Report, makes a number of statements regarding the role of the ILO and therefore this is a good time to make a few remarks on the future of the ILO.

Tripartism is a method, but it is also a style for building consensus among different interests, interests which quite often are opposed. This has been in fact the ultimate reason for the survival of the ILO.

The major changes that have taken place at the political, economic and social levels throughout the world have brought in their wake changes in industrial relations and social security systems in member States.

It is these changes which make it necessary to construct a new paradigm.

This will give legitimacy to the current state of knowledge on this issue, but it will also create opportunities for recognizing the need for building new forms of consensus.

It will enable us to develop, in a rational fashion, a new system of industrial relations and social security in which the ILO will have a major role to play.

It will be useful for establishing theories to explain and forecast the development of industrial relations.

It will, finally, help us to define development of a new rational structure and influence public decisions in our countries.

In this way the ILO can discuss, propose and even confront issues in the labour and social security fields at the highest international levels.

But, in order to do so, the ILO has to keep in step with the changes at the political, economic and social levels which the Director-General has outlined for the Conference. It is therefore essential to launch a far-ranging debate on the need to revise most of the international labour Conventions which were established to meet the needs of other periods of history.

This review of international labour Conventions has a specific meaning.

If we maintain the all-encompassing state system, then what happens is that clandestine work increases enormously and the maintenance of international labour Conventions in their present wording might in the end make them into an obstacle to the various forms of national development, or could even make them obsolete.

In the speech given by Mr. Carlos Saúl Menem he said that the media have made the world into a global village.

In the same line of thought, we believe it is essential to establish a new organizational structure in the ILO based on decentralization of administrative and structural functions, as the Director-General has proposed.

We must therefore initiate a debate so as to reduce the relative weight of the structures which are centralized in Geneva and increase the functions of the regional and national structures.

This will undoubtedly make the technical cooperation system more flexible and efficient.

Our proposal does involve risks and difficulties, but we believe that the ILO will be able to maintain its relevance only if it is able to redefine the tripartite dialogue and its role within the international system of the United Nations.

I should like to say in conclusion that 1995 will see the holding of the World Summit for Social Development in which the ILO can play a special role and in the preparation of which it should participate.

For this Summit we could develop new proposals, both at home and abroad, to ensure that social policy, which should go hand in hand with economic policy, leads to the achievement of an integrated and supportive world that will enable us to resolve with social justice the problems of all workers.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH (representative of Palestine) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate ! On behalf of the Palestinian delegation I would like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his election and we are sure that with his competence and skill this session of the Conference will be a success. I would like also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, and to thank Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his important Report which deals with the social requirements of workers, and I would like to congratulate him on his election for a second term of office.

Since time immemorial humanity has fought against everything that threatened its existence and constituted an affront to its dignity. We can now judge the level of development and progress of a society by its ability to ensure peace and security for its population in the present and the future. And this has become a basic task of society and therefore social security, which includes social protection for workers in the present and the future, and ensures that human dignity is a measure of how far humanity has come in its development. And this becomes a dividing line between civilized and uncivilized behaviour.

Today, as we try to appreciate the gains which have been achieved here, we express our respect and appreciation for the great sacrifices made by the working class in the different countries of the world in order to maintain these gains and make them part of the realities of modern life. This makes us feel responsible for the protection of these gains, on the one hand, and their development on the other, so that they mirror other developments in society.

It is essential to set up efficient social security systems that guarantee social rights for workers and provide a secure future on the basis of social justice, so that they can work efficiently and overcome all obstacles which may contribute to feelings of alienation or exclusion. Efficient social security systems should cover all aspects of the world of labour and at the same time have regard for the social and human perspective including occupational safety and health, old-age, and other issues concerned with respect for human dignity.

Such a system will certainly reduce mistrust and hatred among the social partners, increase trust and feelings of security and certainly open the way for dialogue between the production partners on the basis of the mutual recognition of the rights and duties of each side.

The problem of social security has become increasingly important and it should be given the attention it deserves, particularly at the moment, when we are witnessing the effects of economic changes and structural adjustment in many countries, and which in some cases have led to high levels of unemployment, fewer employment opportunities and higher demand for social services.

Social security is thus essential at a time when the economy is suffering from the negative effects of structural adjustments. Whilst various countries are in a position to take appropriate measures in this field, the Palestinian people are not, particularly those living in the occupied Arab territories, as all social categories of workers are deprived of each and every kind of social security. Urgent solutions are needed particularly among Palestinian workers who are deprived of all the rights enjoyed by workers and recognized in the labour world. And what is more serious is the fact that Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories are not just denied their rights to social security but also to life itself.

In fact, the killings perpetrated by the occupying authorities against the Palestinian people, particularly in the Gaza Strip after it was sealed off make it necessary for international community to take a firm stand and to protect the national rights of these people.

The need to protect the Palestinian people is due to the fact that the super-powers believe only in the power of violence, of force, of the law of the strongest. We call for the application of the Fourth Geneva Convention which was elaborated to protect the civilian populations during times of war, and occupation at a time when the Jews were deported under the Nazi occupation.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – There is a point of order.

Mr. BOOTH (Government adviser, United States) – The speaker is addressing a subject which will be discussed at a special sitting, and is also making comments about a member State which are not relevant to the subject we are discussing. I would like you to call him to order.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – I call on the speaker to confine his comments to the subject on our agenda.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH – ... I would like to emphasize that the question of social security is an urgent issue and we think that human development is also necessary, and an urgent problem. Therefore, we are requesting that the embargoes against the Libyan and Iraqi people be lifted. People should have the right to equal treatment at the international level and not have to suffer from aggression or injustice or oppression. This leads us to focus on certain issues.

Finally we would like to request that the international community and the super-powers in particular protect the Palestinian people and guarantee their right to return to their homeland, enjoy self-determination and establish an independent State.

Original Spanish: Mr. R. RODRIGUEZ (Minister of Labour, Venezuela) – On behalf of the Government of Venezuela, I should like to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

For the third time in one year, it has also been my honour to congratulate the Director-General – Mr. Michel Hansenne, today, at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, and at the 13th Conference of the American States Members of the ILO. The topic of his Report is of particular importance, and I am happy to say that for the most part we share his views and agree with his proposals.

In these early years of the 1990s, Venezuela has experienced deep and painful changes. The three reasons which were given by the Director-General to explain why many countries are considering radical reforms in their social security systems – namely economic difficulties, imbalances resulting from the transition to more market-oriented systems, and the inefficiency in the administration of the social security institutions – are also the causes of the crisis which is affecting our society as a whole.

In our country, the economic difficulties that we are experiencing can be traced to the overwhelming burden of our foreign debt, and the relatively low price of oil on the international market in recent years. These factors have caused real per capita incomes to fall to levels not seen since the early 1970s. In this aspect, Venezuela has lost not one, but two decades.

Given the imbalances resulting from the process of economic restructuring, the angry reaction of those who had grown accustomed to the old rules of the game and of those who were benefiting from the status quo ante was only to be expected. Unfortunately, the conflicts in Venezuelan society today have become very acute due largely to the inadequacy of social services provided by the State.

The breakdown in ideologies and rigid dogmatism is opening the way in our country to a frantic search for innovative responses to the challenge of effectively organizing social transactions. The lack of clear benchmarks and widely shared objectives makes for a very dynamic situation in which conflict is unavoidable. Since 1989, for example, there have been more strikes than in the previous 30 years of democratic administrations.

The conflicts that we see in Venezuelan society today are coming to a head owing to the economic crisis. Consensus is even more difficult to reach because the competition for resources which have become relatively more scarce is a question of life or death for those who want to impose their interests and to preserve their power.

These are the circumstances that led to the tragic events of February of 1989, to the two attempted coups of last year, and to the recent suspension from office of the President of the Republic after a whole series of events resulting from the economic, social and political conflicts which President Pérez himself had fostered.

Fortunately for those of us who believe that liberty is the central condition for living in dignity, and that democracy is the political system which best guarantees liberty, the Venezuelan people's commitment to democracy has saved the constitutional machine from being replaced by dictatorial regimes.

The difficult trials that we have overcome have strengthened our society's attachment to democratic principles and have relegitimized the institutions on which our political system rests. The future will be quite difficult, but we remain optimistic.

It is clear that the socio-political situation in the last decade of the twentieth century is very different from that which we were contemplating only recently. Venezuela, like other countries throughout the world, feels the winds of the market economy. We therefore need to reaffirm the social role of the State and its responsibilities in guaranteeing the well-being of its citizens. The formulation and application of clear and effective policies is an inescapable responsibility of the national governments.

Last year we said that social security exists when the State is able to guarantee for its citizens the elements they need to develop their lives in an environment worthy of the human condition and in which they can develop their full individual potential. We realize that this objective required more than social assistance programmes since we also need to have economic conditions that permit sustainable growth of per capita income in a context of low inflation.

The economic measures that we have taken in order to guarantee the growth of production have led to temporary negative consequences for some of the less privileged groups of our society. Therefore, the Government has designed a series of programmes of subsidies and direct cash transfers to be administered by the Ministry of the Family and other relevant government departments to help such groups. We must emphasize that social programmes should not be viewed as unproductive expenditures; we have to recognize them as essential investments for achieving higher levels of economic development and social welfare.

Social matters cannot be separated from economic questions. Therefore, the restructuring of the economy requires a restructuring of social policy. Compensatory programmes aimed at countering poverty have been accompanied by decisions designed to strengthen social security.

The Ministry of Labour has been a decisive factor in introducing this new social policy, because we are firmly convinced that social policies should be timely, realistic and flexible.

In this sense we are converting the Ministry of Labour to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, based on a set of programmes which will ensure a solid and efficient system of social security. This system includes 17 programmes that cover various areas of benefits for workers and their families.

I am not going to go into detail about the projects that comprise our Comprehensive Social Security System. However, I do want to make a brief comment on just one of these, the restructuring of the Venezuelan Social Security Institute (IVSS).

The reorganization of the IVSS is based on a radical decentralization and deconcentration of functions. With decentralization the regional states will be able to exercise direct control over the management of social security in their own jurisdiction. Decentralization reduces the distance that separates the population receiving benefits from those who direct the Institute, in this way enabling communities to demand results and to establish responsibilities for the proper management or the mismanagement of the social security resources.

Deconcentration, on the other hand, will promote the separation of the three funds that are administered by IVSS. This is a necessary step in order to ensure that all of them will be effectively managed.

Another one of the fundamental pillars of the reorganization of the IVSS is the decision to gradually incorporate the medical care provided by the National Health System.

It should be clear that these policies of decentralization and deconcentration which characterize the reorganization of the IVSS are not ends in themselves, they are merely a means to achieve universality and greater coverage, and to give meaning to the principle of solidarity.

In September of last year I had the very great honour of presiding over the deliberations of the 13th Conference of American States Members of the ILO. On that occasion, in our discussions of social security, we concluded that there were very few differences as regards the relevant standards. All of us agree on the need for a strong and efficient social security system and we all agree on the advantages of an integrated approach. It is just that we are not in agreement on how to achieve these goals. And if we do not agree it is not because we have differing points of views, but because we do not know which solutions are right for each country. This is what we must focus on. The pleasure of expounding on great principles should be replaced by a determination to find practical solutions which make social justice a reality.

Mr. McTIGUE (Minister of Labour, New Zealand) – Congratulations to the President on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish him every success for his term of office.

We welcome the interest of the ILO, expressed through the Director-General's Report, in promoting levels of effectiveness and efficiency in social security and social promotion and protection. My Government's economic and social policy reforms have the one overriding aim of greater security for New Zealanders.

Our reforms have included adjustments to the benefits system with a view to removing disincentives to work and targeting benefit fraud and abuse. We are proceeding towards major reforms in our health system, designed to deliver better value for money in the provision of health services while providing quicker and better services to the sick.

We have also introduced changes to make our accident compensation scheme fairer and more affordable. The overall strategy is one of making social protection more affordable and therefore more sustainable. Our belief is that the efficiencies we will unleash will produce higher quality protection for those who genuinely need it.

It is now two years since the New Zealand Government introduced major labour market reforms through the Employment Contracts Act. These reforms were necessary because of the poor performance of the economy in general and the labour market in particular.

The Employment Contracts Act is designed to promote an efficient labour market by freeing the options available to employees and to employers. The Act provides for choice over the type of employment contract employees and employers wish to negotiate – whether single- or multi-employer, individual or collective, occupational-, industry- or enterprise-based.

The Employment Contracts Act also provides for freedom of association. Employees and employers can choose whom they wish to represent them in employment contract negotiations. At the same time, an existing minimum code of statutory acts, which previously provided protection for only some workers, has been strengthened and extended to protect the rights of all employees, whether they be permanent or temporary employees, full-time or part-time workers.

There is already clear evidence that since the introduction of the reforms just over two years ago positive changes are occurring in the New Zealand labour market. The future looks more promising as a result. Employees and employers have used their new freedom to move decisively towards enterprise bargaining. Previously, collective bargaining in New Zealand was characterized by national, occupational-based awards with little relevance to particular workplaces. Collective bargaining continues to be a central part of the New Zealand industrial relations system. The structure of collective bargaining has, however, changed to enable employers and employees to better respond to the evolving demands of world markets in the 1990s.

A survey undertaken last year showed that by August 1992, 8 per cent of employees were covered by multi-employer contracts, compared with 59 per cent of employees prior to the Act. As at 31 March 1993, of the collective contracts lodged with the Department of Labour for statistical purposes, 97.5 per cent were enterprise-based.

Employees are also exercising their freedom to choose who will represent them. A wide range of bargaining agents are now being used, with unions continuing to represent large numbers of employees in collective negotiations. The Department of Labour's analysis of collective employment contracts indicates that 84 per cent of employees covered choose to be represented by a union.

The Employment Contracts Act and other reforms have created the right environment for sustained economic growth. The Swiss-based World Economic Forum ranked New Zealand as number one in the world for government policies designed to enhance competitiveness. Recent trends include the resumption of economic growth and substantial gains in export market share. This economic growth, the result of consistent policy application, is now showing itself through a marked increase in jobs. This positive trend in employment will be sustained through the Government's continued commitment to labour market policies that will ensure New Zealand remains in this leading position.

I would also like to mention the Government's commitment to the promotion of equal employment opportunities. Two key initiatives have been taken with an emphasis on changing employer behaviour. The first was the establishment of a Joint Equal Opportunities Trust with private-sector employers. The Trust's aim is to use successful role models to alter the behaviour of those employers who are less inclined to initiate change themselves.

The Government's second initiative was the establishment of the Equal Opportunities Contestable Fund. The Fund supports projects which promote EEO policies and practices in the private sector. A number of successful projects have already been completed and we look forward to further progress in this area. The Government is keen to encourage the acceptance of EEO practice as sound business practice.

In recognition of the importance of skills to the individual in securing employment, the New Zealand Government is currently also engaged in reforming education and training in New Zealand. These reforms are designed to provide a basis for improving New Zealand's most important resource – the skills and competence of the New Zealand people. For the purposes of this address, I want to concentrate on two major components of these reforms: the national qualifications framework and the industry skills training strategy.

The national qualifications framework is designed to encourage New Zealanders to learn and continue learning. The national qualifications framework will, for the first time, bring a consistent approach to education and training, offering a variety of pathways for people to gain nationally recognized qualifications. These pathways will include senior secondary schools, polytechnics, universities, private training establishments and workplaces. The competency-based assessment procedures upon which the national qualifications framework is based will allow students to both gain and build upon their credentials in the context which is best suited to them.

The industry skills training strategy is designed to extend high-quality, systematic industry training, linked to nationally recognized qualifications, to new areas of industry, and to increase its depth where it already exists. The strategy is based on the concept that industry is best placed to assist in fulfilling its current and future skill needs. Greater control of government resources applied to industry training is therefore being progressively transferred to industry training organizations. These organizations will be responsible for setting skill standards in their industry and developing and promoting training packages to meet these standards.

New Zealand is heartened by the many significant changes that are currently taking place in the structures and management of the International Labour Organization, which should make it more relevant and better equipped to serve its member States. We admire the readiness of the Director-General to respond to the challenge of bringing the Organization closer to its member constituents and commend the progress he has made. Reform of an organization like this one requires courage, determination and ongoing commitment.

The Governing Body's Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference, which concluded its work last November, achieved exciting results which will encourage the more efficient use of our time here and result in substantial savings for both the Organization and its member States. We look forward to participating in shorter and more effective future Conferences.

I was also delighted to hear about the successful outcome of the Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the Governing Body of the ILO, which concluded its work last November. We particularly value the contributions that were made in the area of health. But there is still room for much more to be achieved. In particular, equally encouraging reforms should result from the in-depth examination of the standards apparatus which is currently under way.

As the Director-General well knows, there is a long way to go. We wish him well on his journey, and assure him of New Zealand's continued keen interest and strong support.

Original Spanish: Mr. NAVARRO LOPEZ (Government delegate, Spain) – I congratulate the President on his election and for his skilful direction of the proceedings of this session of the International Labour Conference. I should like publicly to express my satisfaction at the appointment to such high office of a representative of the Arab community to which we are bound by such close ties of tradition, culture and friendship.

The Report presented by the Director-General at this session of the Conference, in which reference is made to developments in the social security systems of member States as well as to the role that can be played by the ILO in increasing the effectiveness of those systems, is evidence of the firm commitment of the Organization to achieving higher levels of well-being worldwide as well as of the vital role played by mechanisms of social protection in pursuit of that goal.

It is essential for there to be social security systems that are sufficiently developed to extend their coverage to the whole population and offer a full range of economic, health and complementary benefits which can make possible the prevention or mitigation of the various contingencies that can arise.

However, if these principles of protection are to be fully effective it is also essential that they should be designed and operated so as to meet realistic criteria and be in accordance with each country's possibilities. They must be put on a rigorous and stable financial basis in order to guarantee their viability.

In any event the temptation must be avoided to act on levels of social protection so as to make the beneficiaries of these systems bear the consequences of the worldwide economic crisis, on the pretext of solving the problems deriving from that crisis. The aims of making the economy competitive so that it can cope with the problems of recession and loss of market share and of achieving favourable positions in the international community cannot be obtained by giving up the minimum guarantee of the basic needs of workers and citizens in the member States of the ILO.

This would mean forgetting the urgent necessity to link economic development and social development, of which social security systems are a vital part.

Aware of this dual necessity Spain has, for the past ten years, been carrying out a sweeping reform of its social security system, with the major participation of the social partners. This has strengthened the public character of social security and has now put us in possession of a modern system of protection which is well balanced and is much better equipped to achieve its aim.

This great process of reform is gradual and phased and has affected four major areas.

First of all, adjustments in eligibility for and means of calculating contributory benefits, which mean a drastic reduction in the level of benefit fraud, a redirection of resources and emphasis on the contributory and proportional nature of these benefits in order to consolidate the system of protection and avoid the possible danger of insolvency of the system.

Secondly, it means a reform of financing so that the contributory benefits are covered basically from contributions while the non-contributory benefits are financed essentially from tax.

Thirdly, there are reforms in management and administration, with particular impact on the area of collecting through the establishment of a special collecting administration, including compulsory debt recovery.

With these reforms the Spanish system of social protection has been brought into line with the international labour Conventions and Recommendations as reflected in the Director-General's Report. In conformity with those standards:

- the system has now universalized its coverage by extending to the entire population the right to disability and retirement pensions, health benefits and social services;
- the system has also notably improved the content of its benefits. In regard to pensions this is manifested in the maintenance of their purchasing power by indexing pensions to cost-of-living increases as well as by a notable increase in smaller pensions.

The system has strengthened measures to provide for the care and social integration of the disabled and to ensure the welfare of elderly persons.

It has established a comprehensive and flexible protective system through a harmonious combination of two methods: the contributory system, which is aimed at providing income replacement for workers and their families, and the non-contributory system, which is intended to provide an income sufficient to meet the needs of the disabled and elderly who, not having ever worked, or not having worked for a sufficiently long period of time, are excluded from contributory benefits and have insufficient means for subsistence.

Finally, the system has now extended its coverage with the existence of complimentary regimes, individual or company pension plans and funds which workers can join privately or through their employers in order to improve their benefits.

Although advances such as those achieved in my country can help to restore confidence of those who aspire to social protection systems, which are socially just and economically viable, we must not forget the existence of major difficulties in the consolidation of these systems, which are clearly reflected in the Directort-General's Report. The ILO has a key role to play in overcoming these difficulties in the area of multilateral technical cooperation for less developed member States or those that are passing through major socio-economic change. In those States systems of social protection are of critical importance for cushioning the effect that socio-economic adjustment measures may have on the satisfaction of needs which comprise the ideal coverage of social security systems, as compiled in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102).

Thus new horizons are opening up for the ILO's work, hardly explored to date, in which the more developed countries should also participate in order to give practical expression to the principle of international solidarity.

This is illustrated, for example, by the agreement which was signed by the social security ministers of the countries of the Ibero-American community at their meeting in Madrid on 17 and 18 June 1992 when they declared their intention of giving resolute support to the coordination of general and specific, multilateral and bilateral cooperation programmes to enable the development of their systems of social security to serve the aim of social progress. In this context of internationalization of social security systems, mention may be made of the adoption of an Ibero-American social security code as an international standard, to serve as a general framework for the definition of the contents of social security, to enable the orientation of the evolution and development of the existing systems in a common process based on respect for the particular features and possibilities of each country and, finally, which can gradually and flexibly become a minimum standard for social protection throughout the region.

In conclusion, it only remains for me once again to stress the timeliness of the theme proposed for our reflection by the Director-General whose Report provides so telling an analysis of one of the greatest challenges facing the ILO at the end of the century. The solutions proposed in the Report, with which we fully agree, are based, as has been the case for the past 75 years, on the essential work of the ILO, its principles, its legal instruments and its means of action.

Mr. GIUGNI (Minister of Labour, Italy) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election at this session of the International Labour Conference. We are about to elect the Governing Body, which will have the difficult but stimulating task of playing a determinant role in implementing the guidelines established by the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, just after his re-election. To him I want to reiterate my warm and sincere congratulations. In the spirit of those guidelines, we should try to invest our Organization with "the means of intervening in a credible and effective manner in the main international debates, where the financial and economic orientations are being decided".

The conviction is gaining ground that it is impossible to make headway with democracy without having a blueprint of it. In our view of democracy, the political, economic and social aspects all interact, and it is the interaction which enhances the freedom of all men and women.

In such a perspective, cooperation is needed to formulate proposals and promote agreements and common objectives. If we proceed along these lines, the specific role of the ILO shall itself be enhanced.

Economic stagnation, grave problems of structural adjustment, persistent business-cycle difficulties and the resulting growth in unemployment, increased migration and worsening pockets of poverty: the combination of all these factors makes for rather bleak prospects. Tackling them requires: (a) enormous planning efforts; (b) consistent initiatives to identify objectives and priorities; (c) selective and judicious use of resources to maximize their social impact.

The great question we now face is not whether or not to maintain the Welfare State. It is how to make it workable. The Welfare State has been badly hit by the contraction in financial resources. It is suffering from the consequences of changing demographic trends and changing attitudes. Solutions to these problems are urgently needed all over the world. There is a need both for a new pact between social partners and between generations and for more specific and better targeted public action.

I agree with the point made in the Director-General's Report. It is not always possible to export the experience of one country or of a particular geographical area to other countries or areas. None the less, the convergence of objectives, as specified in the relevant ILO regulations, remains of fundamental importance.

The upheavals occurring in today's world increase the need for certain and universal principles which can become the cornerstone of mutually established and accepted rules.

I would like to underline, however, that in my country, as elsewhere, we are fully aware that the fundamental principles of the universality of services, of the "individualization of rights", and of equal treatment, require solutions which are in keeping with the new cycle of social policies.

Any reform of social security institutions must take account of these processes.

One of the first achievements in my country was the reform of the mandatory retirement system. This was discussed for 15 years but approved only recently. It has been operating since early this year.

This reform aims to improve efficiency, promote uniform treatment especially with regard to retirement age, and develop supplementary retirement schemes based on voluntary pension funds. These funds are also intended to increase savings and investments.

A specific feature of the Italian experience, which is also of interest abroad, has been the constant search for social consensus on ways of achieving a vital objective, namely that of maintaining and developing the welfare state while adapting it to meet new conditions.

This aspect is now being discussed in detail as part of tripartite negotiations currently under way. This is a model of social collaboration which will bear fruit, I hope, in a few weeks.

We must continue in this direction, redefining social security as we do so in the light of the qualitative changes taking place in employment relations.

The systems currently in force were designed to meet the needs of career employment lasting an entire working life. They are quite inappropriate to the new and diversified employment relations, which may vary according to the age and circumstances of individual workers.

For this reason, we are keenly interested in the conclusions of the committee dealing with part-time employment, which has at long last been put on this Conference's agenda.

We hope that in 1994, this Conference will submit for approval a Convention combining provisions for the protection of workers and provisions for the promotion of part-time work, and I hope it will be the first in a series of initiatives to develop flexible and diversified types of employment.

In my opinion, a major step towards the formulation of such a Convention will be a complete definition of a system for ensuring that part-time workers enjoy the rights granted to all workers in general.

The challenge for the ILO will be to establish a set of rules promoting flexibility while ensuring the maximum of protection as part of an active employment policy.

A higher-level policy commitment is required in this direction. That it is urgently needed is clear from the forecasts recently published by the OECD on economic growth and employment. The need to apply new tools to the labour market makes transparent rules, agreed by all the parties concerned more, rather than less, necessary. In this context, ILO standards play a fundamental role even with respect to social policies elaborated by other institutions, such as the European Community.

ILO standards, in fact, must be the common basis of international social policies. Italy has always been guided by this principle. Of no less importance is the process of revising agreements currently in force.

A final but very important point of concern to us all is the action being taken to secure approval of the Convention and Recommendation on major industrial accidents. Just a few days ago in Sicily, my country was faced with a major industrial disaster in which seven workers lost their lives. Safety at the workplace and training on how to deal with emergencies must become fundamental principles in all our countries. Furthermore, we must persevere with our efforts to establish close links between the enforcement of rules and technical cooperation.

The activities of the Turin Centre in this and other areas represents a major success on the part of our Organization. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Centre's Director: it is widely acknowledged that the 1992-95 development plan is producing satisfactory results, and the recent visit by the United Nations Secretary-General Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali is evidence of the international prestige enjoyed by the Turin Centre.

I am confident that the financial constraints on our activities will not reduce their effectiveness; the priorities already established in the 1994-95 programme will surely produce positive results. This is also due in part to the positive approach to interdepartmental projects and multi-disciplinary teams.

In this period of major upheaval and potential fragmentation, the ILO has a great asset, and that is tripartism. We must continue to exploit this valuable feature.

Original Spanish: Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA (Workers' delegate, Chile) – I should like to begin by congratulating the Director-General on his excellent initiatives in modernizing the ILO and giving new impetus to its work. He has proposed the efficient use of teams to implement tripartism, social consensus-building and high-quality international cooperation to match the changes that are taking place in society as a whole.

In my statement, I shall refer to the following topics: prevention of major industrial accidents, part-time work, social security, and the role and mandate of the ILO.

The second discussion on the prevention of major industrial accidents will enable us to adopt a Convention and a Recommendation to adequately regulate this area. Governments, employers and workers have an obligation to ensure that the development of productive activities cares for the life of workers, the balance of nature and the quality of life of the entire population. Economic development cannot contribute to destroying or impoverishing human life.

However, the current unbridled and wild race for development based only on material factors is producing imbalances in natural and in human terms. Therefore we unreservedly support the ILO's timely initiative and we hope that it will result in the instruments required in order to overcome this problem.

The discussion on part-time work analyses in a timely fashion this topic, which is an inherent part of our economies in the current circumstances. In recent years, part-time work has become evermore common. It is no longer an occasional nor exceptional form of work. We workers are not opposed to this type of activity, but neither do we want to see it replace full-time work. We believe that when part-time work is freely accepted without being imposed arbitrarily, it should be regulated on the basis of justice and equity so that the requirements of economic development are in harmony with the interests and the rights of workers as human beings and as the main factor creating wealth.

Traditional employment regulations are inadequate for this new type of work. We must therefore use our imagination to find the appropriate legal and social protection mechanisms to cover the question of part-time work. The ILO, by undertaking a study of this topic, is showing its clear-sightedness and reacting in a timely fashion to new situations arising from modern development.

As a Chilean, I cannot fail to express my appreciation for the very perceptive study conducted by the ILO on the social security system in Chile. I totally share the conclusions contained in the Report with respect to the system in our country, which basically is the same system that was imposed upon us by force by the military dictatorship. It has not been able to be changed because the Government lacks the majority in one of the houses of Parliament, because of the presence of the "appointed senators", which is an institution that we inherited from Pinochet.

The system that exists in Chile is not one of social security, but rather a series of individual insurance schemes. Its underlying principles are not those which characterize social security. Those who admire the system now in place in Chile should ask themselves this question: Do they want a system of social security or do they want individual insurance policies? Given the importance of this topic, the answer to the question should be found through democratic consultation and not in an authoritarian manner, as was the case in my country.

The system that now exists is not universal. One-third of the labour force is not covered. Another third is included in the system but does not keep its contributions up to date, and therefore is unable to receive benefits. Most of those whose contributions are not kept up to date are in a situation in which the employers have indeed deducted this money from wages but have not met their obligation to turn this money over to the ensuring institution.

As all of us know, the system is financed exclusively by the workers, which is unjust. The employers and the Government are not assuming their obligations to cooperate in the system of social security. Despite this, the funds collected are not managed by the workers, but rather by special agencies without any participation by the contributors. Some trade union organizations recently have begun to establish such bodies, but the market is dominated by very powerful groups which were established during the dictatorship and which manage the largest part of the workers' resources, thereby obtaining very high profits.

The Chilean trade unions will seek every opportunity to change the system, particularly by extending coverage to all workers, establishing social solidarity mechanisms and obtaining recognition of our right to administer our own funds.

Finally, I should like to state our categorical support for the International Labour Organization, given the important role that it has played in the humanization of labour relations and in conferring dignity upon work throughout the world. At a time when we see unbridled capitalism arising in new forms, the ILO has more than ever an important role to play. We are not opposed to the challenges of a modern economy which forces us to seek institutions and mechanisms that can respond to a very new type of reality. But this quest to adapt labour relations to the modern economy should be carried out with full respect for the basic rights of the individuals involved. We cannot accept that a legitimate search for greater efficiency can only take place at the expense of ethical values and human dignity.

This inevitable adaptation of labour to the modern world should be a joint enterprise of governments, employers and workers. Only in this way can we ensure that we can obtain economic efficiency with respect for the rights of workers. Therefore, tripartism, the basic principle of the ILO, is as relevant as ever. In our modern world there is more room for tripartite agreements than in the past.

In our country we have managed to reach important tripartite agreements, and this is the beginning of a long road in search of agreements that will enable us to leave behind the traditional confrontational power struggles which are not of benefit to anyone.

This is just the beginning of a process which has not led to concrete agreements at the level of the enterprise or productive sectors. We do not yet have a permanent system of relations capable of taking binding decisions. However, despite their limitations these tripartite agreements have been a very important factor in my country's political stability and successful economic management. Hence the observation that the constraints of this process should not prompt us to cast it aside but rather, on the contrary, to see how we can overcome these problems in order to continue forward in the same direction, with more energy and more quickly. The ILO therefore represents for us a point of reference and an irreplaceable source of support.

The critical comments that may be directed against the ILO, as against any human undertaking, cannot affect its underlying principles. It is precisely the tripartite nature of the ILO which is the key factor that has enabled it to obtain the significant achievements recognized by all.

Therefore, speaking on behalf of the Single Central Organization of Chilean Workers (CUT) and of all the workers of Chile, we express our full support for the work that is being done and should continue to be done by the ILO, and we once again congratulate the Director-General and express our special appreciation to the Workers' Education Branch for the effective and professional work which it is doing in our country in the field of workers' training.

Original Arabic: Mr. BEN SEDDIK (Workers' delegate, Morocco) – I should first like to associate myself with the congratulations offered to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that he will guide the proceedings of the Conference to a successful conclusion. On behalf of the Moroccan workers and on my own behalf, I should also like to offer warm congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his brilliant and well-deserved re-election to the office of Director-General of the ILO. I further associate myself wholeheartedly with the many justified tributes to his personal qualities and his tireless efforts on behalf of our Organization.

I also wish to commend both the relevant choice of social protection as the subject of the annual Report of the Director-General and the quality of the Report, which describes in admirably clear terms the challenges facing social security systems throughout the world.

In the course of this century, social security has become well-nigh universal, usually thanks to the campaigns waged on its behalf by workers and the trade union movement. It is one of the greatest and finest achievements of modern times and traces its origins to one of the perennial features of organized human society: provision for the future and solidarity between generations, between the active and the unactive and between the "haves" and the "have-nots".

As clearly noted in the Report of the Director-General, social security and protection systems are everywhere suffering the consequences of economic uncertainty and bottlenecks in development, a worsening employment situation, stagnating production and, in many cases, stark inequalities leading to marginalization and despair in ever larger sectors of the population.

Basically, it is the very idea of social security and protection that has come under attack over the past decade. So-called adjustment programmes, introduced in the guise of remedies based on pure economic theory and obeying solely the law of supply and demand, were unjustifiably and cynically used as a pretext for freezing or even dismantling social security schemes and usurping the resources available for social solidarity.

As noted in the Report of the Director-General, an urgent need to improve social protection machinery has been felt in some cases, especially in what are called the developing countries, at the very time when the resources available for that purpose are dwindling.

It is equally true that in some cases, in the same category of country, including my own, social security funds – which represent workers' contributions exclusively and are therefore the private and, in principle, inalienable property of the workers – are transferred by government decision and against the will of the workers to the state coffers or used for forms of investment devoid of social content.

These social security systems thus show sizable surpluses – albeit in accounting terms only because the public authorities prevent their distribution among the workers and oppose any increase in benefits.

Such denials of social security are the direct upshot of a series of abuses of power that flout the very principle of tripartism: here we have social security systems to which the State does not contribute – civil servants having ad hoc systems of their own – and yet the government blithely takes over their deliberations from the social partners, taking decisions in their place, ignoring their deliberations and very frequently presenting them with a fait accompli.

As a result of this type of government behaviour in flagrant contravention of national social security law, workers have been deprived of the benefit to which their contributions entitle them and have had to make do with derisory and stagnant allowances, although their social security fund is recording substantial surpluses and paying them over to state financial institutions for uses beyond the influence of the social partners.

We see the same type of behaviour, which flies in the face of social solidarity, when governments try to entrust private – basically profit-making – bodies with the management of the basic compulsory system of medical coverage for workers, although international experience in that area has shown that solidarity is the key to efficiency, cost control and to the viability of such systems.

This 80th Session of the International Labour Conference provides us with a golden opportunity to remind public authorities that what workers contribute to social security systems are contributions to a work of solidarity and collective insurance and not an additional tax payment that can be channelled by the government at will into the public kitty or into uses that are bereft of social content.

The purpose of this commonsense reminder is to achieve a return to sound principles of tripartism and also, especially in cases where the State does not contribute to the social security system, to ensure that the social partners are left free to negotiate, to determine the level of contributions and benefits, and to actually administer social security.

It should be borne in mind that social protection is not a luxury but an absolute necessity for countries in the throes of a development crisis that promises to persist, and also that the introduction of social security in our countries represented a dual and highly valued achievement – in social terms and in national terms – enabling our peoples to rejoice at having finally triumphed over the injustice of the colonial regimes with their discriminatory social protection arrangements. One can then appreciate that the working masses set great political store by social security and a viable social security system.

If we consider the impact on economic activity and national production of the circulation of social security funds, the tremendous importance of safeguarding this asset for the workers and the unparalleled value of its contribution to well-being, prosperity and social justice will become clear.

The ILO has a prominent all-round role to play in this connection and I warmly congratulate the Director-General on having highlighted in his Report the means whereby the ILO can meet the needs of its constituents.

I should like to add – voicing the Moroccan workers' desire to see the ILO playing an increasingly prominent role – that we must never lose sight of the original aims for which the Organization was founded. Its mission focused on workers and their well-being. The ILO's technical assistance is a valuable asset and will prove even more effective if it ensures that workers are given a say everywhere in order to defend their interests and improve their lot. It is in this spirit that we should be on our guard against the inertia of many governments in dealing with the expert opinions and reports of the ILO, which, though often excellent, tend to gather dust in the drawers of government offices.

(Mr. Tabani takes the chair.)

Original French: Mrs. SMET (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – Allow me first of all, to wish the President much success in his task of leading the Conference.

More than ever we should welcome the fact that those responsible for the world of work in member States are able to meet and work intensively together during these few weeks in Geneva.

The Conference, in fact, bears witness to major economic and social developments which, if we are not careful, could well undermine the general confidence in our social protection systems or pose a challenge to the authority of international labour standards. I should like to develop these comments.

The present situation of the economy and employment is a challenge to the solidity and the permanence of our insurance and social protection systems.

We all seem to be beset on the one hand by a determination to go on liberalizing international trade for the benefit of growth, employment and equity, and at the same time, on the other, by the enormous problems of poverty, unemployment and economic recession.

These challenges require us to think hard about ways and means of maintaining or improving social protection, particularly on behalf of the most underprivileged, as well as about initiatives for creating the maximum amount of jobs.

An organization such as the ILO needs to ask itself about the causes of and the remedies for the disparities in our social insurance schemes which either divide groups of member countries in different stages of development or have not prevented a dual society from emerging in the industrialized countries, even though they are the ones best equipped to extend general social protection to the greatest number.

Belgium, confronted by low or even negative growth and an enormous fiscal deficit, does not intend to call in question the foundations of its social protection system. On the contrary, it is seeking in very difficult economic circumstances to maintain the financial and high-level protection of the system.

The Government is, together with the social partners that are closely involved in managing the system, examining the changes that have to be made and the improvements that are desirable in the administration of the social protection system.

The Director-General's Report confronts us objectively with the major issues of the future of social protection to which the ILO will need to devote a considerable amount of reflection and technical cooperation.

In my country one question which is of concern to me in this context is how to reduce labour costs and make possible the creation of carefully targeted and sectorally concentrated employment for poorly qualified workers with few skills.

This question is a challenge to the financing of social protection which in my own country undoubtedly rests too much on workers' contributions.

This question also arises in the broader framework of Europe at large. This is certainly going to be a subject that I shall be addressing in greater depth with my European colleagues and the social partners during Belgium's presidency of the Council of the European Communities starting next month.

Furthermore, within the framework of the European community but also within that of the Council of Europe and the ILO, Belgium would like to see vigorous international social standards which provide a framework for these economic and social changes.

In the industrialized countries we are threatened by two lines of argument. On the one hand, governments and parties tend to talk about the exorbitant cost of social protection to justify the reduction or abolition of social rights, while others seek to play down the legal authority of the bodies responsible for supervising international social standards to safeguard national freedom of action.

These are two major dangers which all of us here must face with the support of the Office. Having studied the Programme and Budget proposals for the next biennium, I am glad to see that the ILO's standard-setting activity will remain the backbone of the Organization's work.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election which testifies to the confidence placed in him as head of the Office in the task of helping us to keep our bearings in these times of sweeping change, and is a recognition of the immense work done to reform the Office and to give the Organization the means of ensuring its credibility in very difficult budgetary circumstances.

I hope that the newly joined Members of ILO will have a stimulating effect, in their turn, on the Organization.

As they confront their difficult budgetary circumstances, our States must make a larger and larger commitment, alongside the Organization, in specific programmes beyond making simply their assessed contributions to the ILO.

As far as I – and my country – am concerned, I place great hopes in the ILO's programmes aimed at limiting the adverse consequences of child labour. The ILO has adopted a number of Conventions and Recommendations in this sphere, including Convention No. 138. But these texts will not in themselves suffice to solve the fundamental problem.

There is need in the field to encourage measures to reduce the scale of child labour, to counter the manifest and odious abuses, to provide more information on alternative activities, to improve training as well as protection.

Projects on too small a scale, too limited in scope will not suffice to achieve our aims. What we need to do is to support programmes and reforms of a lasting nature.

A number of Belgian television channels have screened the video Shackled children, an excellent ILO documentary which gave us all food for thought.

Having recently strengthened its own legislation on child labour, Belgium had a duty to contribute, alongside other European countries, to the financing of the IPEC programme for the elimination of child labour.

I appeal to other industrialized countries, too, to support that programme.

In its most deleterious and abusive manifestations, child labour reflects a tragic denigration of the dignity of human work and yet of which it is only really one form.

What is one to say about the lack of interest in work being done in the informal sector where the Director-General has also invited the Organization to take a more positive view?

Furthermore, in this time of growing unemployment and massive layoffs, is there not another form of denigration of human labour, namely a lack of recognition?

Some enterprises, all too frequently, forget their essential role in society, seeing only short-term profit and allowing themselves to be seduced by the prospects of immediate return on their productive equipment and material investment, ignoring and thereby devaluing their human capital.

We cannot stand by and allow technical and economic progress to leave the unemployed and poorly qualified jobseekers little if any chance of getting a decent job.

There is no room here for fatalism!

We must show greater solidarity in sharing out the work available.

Alongside initiatives, in the sphere of vocational training, apprenticeship, social and occupational integration, sharing the available work remains an urgent requirement and must be an integral part of employment policy. In this sense the use of part-time work deserves to be encouraged, although in order to make it attractive, part-time workers should benefit from a statute which guarantees the essential rights enjoyed by full-time workers. These guarantees could perhaps be made proportional to the time worked.

I am strongly in favour of voluntary part-time work, whether that work is taken on in order to escape from unemployment or the prospect of future unemployment, or whether it is chosen temporarily in order to provide a better match between home life and occupational activity, provided that the choice is not a choice only of women.

A genuine social statute of part-time work can help redistribute the available work and avoid or restrict the improper use of this kind of employment, thereby reducing the number of workers who are passive victims of the economic crisis.

It remains for me to thank the President and the Director-General of the ILO for their personal commitment to promoting the dignity of work and dignity at work throughout the world.

Mr. BONI (Secretary of State for Labour and Social Policy, Poland) – On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Poland and the tripartite Polish delegation I wish to express our congratulations to His Excellency Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the post of the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him and the Vice-Presidents every success in achieving satisfactory results in this Conference for the sake of the governments, employers and workers of all our countries.

I wish also to extend warm greetings to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, on the occasion of his re-election to this responsible post. Entrusting him with this function for another term of office is undoubtedly an expression of high appreciation of his performance as Director-General. His stewardship of the ILO is the guarantee of consistent implementation of the tasks which will be set before the International Labour Organization in the years to come.

It is incumbent on the present session of the Conference to define these tasks and the basic directions of ILO activities in the future. The ongoing reform of the International Labour Office, the organizational changes in the work and structure of the Conference and the Governing Body, as well as the need for considerable reductions of expenditure in many areas of activities result from the necessity to adjust to rapidly changing realities and needs, particularly in the context of the acute financial crisis.

These changes, however, should in no case affect the implementation of the basic aims of the Organization, nor efforts to meet the expectations of its Members. A more fundamental division of competence of specific structures of the ILO is a necessary condition of success of the ongoing reforms.

Poland supports the active partnership policy. We would like to see it as an instrument of a real determination to bring the Organization closer to the needs and expectations of its Members. This policy has a particular relevance in a regional dimension in dealing with problems of labour markets and social policy.

The Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, is a document of particular importance. It emphasizes the dilemmas and challenges which face governments of different States in the sphere of social policy. We must not disregard the fact that every member State, irrespective of the political and economic problems faced by its government, and irrespective of its geographical position, is under the obligation to observe the right of every individual to social protection, which is one of the fundamental human rights.

The situation prevailing in countries in transition is a specific one as has been correctly pointed out by the Director-General in his Report.

A transformation of the totalitarian system into a democratic one is a difficult and time-consuming process for it is carried out in conditions of economic recession, growing unemployment and high, although decreasing, inflation.

In spite of a distinct improvement in the economic situation in Poland in 1992, the social costs of the transformation process are still formidable.

In recent years, the share of social expenditure in Poland has started to grow rapidly. In 1993 it reached 21.4 per cent of GNP, compared to 11.5 per cent in 1990. The share of pension benefits over this period grew from 6.9 to 13.4 per cent of GNP.

The sine qua non of a successful continuation of the reforms initiated in Poland four years ago is social acceptance of the restructuring process and the joint efforts of the Government and the social partners, in accordance with the principle of social dialogue and tripartism.

In this context it is extremely important for the role of employers and their participation in the continuing process of further active transformation in Central and Eastern European countries to be substantially strengthened.

The tripartite negotiations which were held in Poland between the Government, trade unions and employer organizations in late 1992 and early 1993 could serve as an example of such a strategy.

The essence of these negotiations was to reach an agreement between the social partners on the basic premises of legal acts concerning the process and the instruments of privatization. Financial restructuring of state-owned enterprises, as well as guarantees of social security and social protection of workers of the enterprises under transformation, were also priority items in these negotiations.

The accords, reached as a result of the negotiating process, have become the substance of a tripartite social agreement concluded in February this year, which is called "Pact on State Enterprise in Transformation".

The implementation of the Pact has been suspended. The recent vote of no confidence, taken at the initiative of the trade union "Solidarnosc", resulted in a political crisis and the subsequent dissolution of the Parliament. However, the Government is ready to give effect to those Pact provisions which can be implemented and, at the same time, to ensure that in several months, after the elections set for 19 September this year, the Pact becomes a priority for a new Parliament.

In the days of the centrally planned economy, the scope of workers' social rights was very broad, although these rights were declaratory rather than real. The State, through its administrative and economic organs (including enterprises), guaranteed full employment. It also performed the role of an organizer and executor of almost all activities in the field of social policy. This approach to social policy had to change when the process of reform started.

As a starting-point for a programme of reforms in the social sphere, there should be a clear distinction between state responsibility in the field of social security and the responsibilities of the community and each adult member of the society. The role and scope of the social responsibility of the employer must be likewise more clearly spelled out.

It is our considered view that technical cooperation, one of the principal and particularly important components of the ILO's mandate, calls for reassessment and upgrading.

Until quite recently, Poland was only a recipient country of technical assistance implemented in significant part by the ILO.

At present we undertake our own assistance programmes with regard to other countries of Central and Eastern Europe, which have recently embarked on a difficult and costly path of transformation.

We would like to share our experience with these countries and assist them in reforming their labour markets and social policy with a view to bringing down the costs of transformations which they are undertaking.

In seeking to overcome our difficulties, we have succeeded in elaborating mutually agreed upon forms of cooperation between donor-implementing agencies and recipient countries. These forms of cooperation proved both workable and useful. Their best illustration is the implementation of the project to improve labour services, which is financed by the Swiss Government and executed by the ILO. Another relevant example is the "Social Dialogue" project, financed by the European Community under its PHARE programme.

The conclusion we have reached is that it is indispensable to combine the efforts of the ILO with those of other international organizations and institutions for the effective realization of technical cooperation. Such a combination of efforts, however, will not be feasible without mutual adjustment of the legal and financial rules, a measure which would go a long way towards facilitating the integration of activities both of the donors and the implementing agencies.

In 1994 the ILO will mark its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I have the honour to inform the Conference that the national celebrations of these events in Poland will be held under the honorary patronage of President Lech Walesa.

These anniversaries are of particular significance for my country as well as for other founding members of the Organization. They should stimulate ILO Members to add new impetus to the work of the Organization, and to make it better prepared to fully implement its purposes and tasks. Poland is determined to make its own contribution towards this end.

Mrs. KELTOSOVA (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, Slovakia) – It is a great honour for me to be able to participate actively in this top venue of the world of labour. I am speaking on behalf of one of the most recent Members of the International Labour Organization – the Slovak Republic – which, however, as one of the two States succeeding former Czechoslovakia, had been among the original Members of the ILO.

Because of our former association with the so-called Soviet Bloc countries, for more than 40 years of State-paternalism the social sphere was constantly distorted by its subordination to economic development. Even the current transition to a market economy is having dramatic effects on the standard of living of our population and on the growth of unemployment (currently approximately 12 per cent). The State still to a large extent subsidizes education, health care, housing, transportation and other vital spheres of life.

On 1 September 1992 the Constitution of the Slovak Republic was adopted. It guarantees basic human rights and freedoms, political, social and other rights and makes special provisions for the rights of national minorities and ethnic groups. The current development of the social welfare system is primarily aimed at building a comprehensive system and an independent social insurance fund, separate from the state budget, which would leave open the possibility of autonomous and democratic forms of management and financing of social insurance. In extending social services, a good deal of support is given to non-profit, non-governmental organizations with charitable aims.

The main task of the new family policy is to abandon exclusively population-related aspects, and support the social and cultural functions of the family. One of the events organized in Slovakia as part of the International Year of the Family was the establishment of the International Centre for Family Study in Bratislava. This centre is currently financed by the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Family.

This is far from the only example of how Slovakia shares the aims and objectives of the United Nations Organization, and particularly the International Labour Organization. It is for me both a great honour and pleasure to be able to announce that the Slovak Republic has the intention to ratify before the end of this Conference all Conventions that were adopted by the former Czech and Slovak Federative Republic. By the end of this year a few more will still have to be ratified.

I take the liberty of expressing my conviction that our admission to the ILO will be mutually beneficial. We do have ideas to offer, not only as regards East-West issues but also concerning North-South questions. For example, one of the leading topics of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference is industrial accidents. Our experience, tradition and tripartite approach in this respect is comparable with the standards adopted by the developed democracies of the West. Since 1969 we have had an institutionalized labour inspection service in the form of a specialized state supervisory body. The participation of trade unions in the area of occupational safety has always been perceived as constructive assistance in the protection of the citizen – which means the employee.

On the other hand, as regards our young democracy, we will probably not avoid some developmental errors. The democratic State is a much more complex system than the electronic voting machine. All the more reason to tolerate a certain amount of error. Thus, we will value, especially now, the friendly assistance of the ILO. We would appreciate more direct and more concrete contacts with the ILO multidisciplinary team headquartered in Budapest. The team covering the ILO project for family entrepreneurship in Bratislava appears to be particularly promising. A permanent ILO Liaison Officer would be particularly important for us, especially as we face the potential increase of social and labour problems. We also maintain that the provision of greater assistance to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe should not necessarily result in an absolute increase of the budget and donation funds. A more efficient coordination of multilateral and bilateral assistance, elimination of duplication of efforts, and the cancellation of activities based on prestigious or other motives rather than a genuine intention to help would greatly improve our situation.

By way of conclusion I would like to express my sincere conviction that the ILO will successfully cope with the demands of the new world situation in the world of labour. We can offer our modest means to help it bridge its own period of transition. We wish you a lot of success.

Mr. BRERETON (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – Australia was a founding Member of the ILO in 1919 and has always been active in its work. I am therefore particularly pleased to be able to speak on the subject of social protection, a matter of fundamental significance to both the ILO and to Australia.

The ILO can rightly claim to have played a key part in the spread of social security protection internationally. In 1919 there was no comprehensive system of social security anywhere. Now, on the eve of the ILO's 75th anniversary, such systems exist in many countries.

The ILO has made a remarkable contribution towards this achievement by helping to secure the recognition of social protection as a basic right. The challenge for all of us is to make adequate levels of such protection universal. Until this occurs, social justice is denied.

The difficulty of providing such protection is immense. There is an immediate threat to human existence from poverty, from famine and from war in many parts of the world. This has distracted international attention from the precarious situation of millions of people in many countries which lack fair and effective social security systems. The Director-General's Report provides a timely focus on this issue.

The Report before the Conference contains a clear strategy for improving the social protection of workers. The Australian Government supports the Director-General's analysis in his approach. The three-tier approach to protection suggested in this Report has much in common with Australia's experience. We have a social assistance provision through Government in many areas, from old-age and disability pensions to unemployment benefits and family allowances.

Australia also has a universal health-care system, called Medicare, which provides medical and hospital treatment for all Australians. Employers are legally required to provide benefits for workers, including compensation for sickness, for accidents and superannuation, and many workers also have the option of supplementing these superannuation schemes through their own contributions.

As the Director-General has observed, the extension of social protection is part and parcel of the broader issue of economic, political and social development. On coming to power in 1983, the Australian Labour Government recognized this fundamental principle when it entered into a social compact called "the Accord" with the Australian Council of Trade Unions.

The latest accord, the seventh since 1983, builds on the progress made under its predecessors. The concept of the social wage has become entrenched and the union movement has moderated its claims for better wages and conditions. It has done so in the light of improvements by Government to state-funded health care, to family assistance, to child care, to pensions, to education and training, and to universal superannuation for employees.

As a result of the accords, there have been remarkable improvements in Australia's industrial relations and related economic performance. We have not of course been shielded from the effect of international economic fluctuations, but Australia is in a much stronger position now to withstand the pressures on our domestic economy.

We are not resting on our laurels. We are also committed to legislate later this year to facilitate collective bargaining and enterprise agreements. The legislation will represent a significant evolution of the Australian system by reducing our traditional reliance on arbitration by our industrial tribunals.

We want collective bargaining to focus on improving productivity. This will improve the competitiveness of our economy. However, it is fundamentally important that the conditions of Australian workers are protected and improved.

We will not permit workers to be disadvantaged through the unfair erosion or loss of their terms and conditions of employment. The Government intends to ensure that there is an effective safety net of legally enforceable awards and determinations to guarantee fair employment conditions for those unable to reach agreement through the collective bargaining process. Those agreements will have to be fair and not disadvantage workers.

An important feature of the latest accord is the Government's commitment to further strengthen key minimum entitlements for all workers. The Government intends to complement the existing federal award system of protection of employment conditions, with legislation ensuring that entitlements are provided for minimum wages, equal pay and termination of employment protection.

We will also provide for the needs of workers with family responsibilities by ensuring the availability of parental leave. The independent national industrial tribunal will be able to ensure that basic rights in all these areas are protected. This legislation will be based on the ILO Conventions dealing with these issues, using the external affairs power of the Australian Constitution – a power which enables the federal Government to legislate to implement Australia's international obligations. This is the first time that this power will have been applied to industrial relations.

We are committed to developing our legislation in full consultation with representatives of employers, the union movement and state governments in the Australian federal system. This process illustrates the importance of tripartism, another reflection of the influence of this Organization. We believe that the best and the most enduring improvements will be achieved through consultation.

Australia's commitment to the ILO is demonstrated through our ratification of five Conventions during this past year. This brings the total of Conventions ratified to some 53. We are now working towards the ratification of several more.

As the Director-General has pointed out, the social security Conventions have received relatively few ratifications, even in countries which have well-developed systems of social security. The lack of ratification of the ILO's social security Conventions highlights two problems. Firstly, some Conventions are simply not sufficiently flexible. They do not recognize the diversity of approaches that are taken by governments in providing the level of protection sought under ILO standards.

Secondly, the ILO must review its standards more systematically so that they remain relevant and achievable. In this respect, I am encouraged to see that one of the many important reforms foreshadowed in the ILO budget concerns the ILO's standard-setting work.

The social protection of workers can be enhanced by higher levels of technical cooperation, and Australia stands ready to work cooperatively with the ILO to advance the social protection of workers and their families, particularly in our Asian-Pacific region. Social protection policy must be viewed as complementary to economic and fiscal policy. All too often structural adjustment policies have taken too little account of the need for social protection measures. The ILO's Governing Body has regularly examined the social dimension of structural adjustment since the High-Level Meeting in 1987. Australia has been an active participant in these discussions. But this principle is not yet sufficiently recognized or applied.

The ILO has a very important role here. It must continue to assist the social partners and governments to deal effectively with these issues. The ILO must also seek to influence the approach of the international financial institutions to ensure their recognition of the fundamental importance of social justice in achieving effective and enduring social and structural adjustment.

Finally, I urge Members of this Organization to give their wholehearted support to the continuing process of reform. This is absolutely vital if the ILO is to maintain its credibility and its relevance. Together, we must provide the foundation for the ILO to continue to be a dynamic and effective international agency. The need for social justice in the world of work is just as pressing as it has ever been. We must enable the ILO to meet this mandate as effectively as possible. This is one of the very best ways in which we can pursue the attainment of freedom, the attainment of dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity to which each individual is entitled.

Mrs. LAURISTIN (Minister of Social Affairs, Estonia) – On behalf of the Estonian delegation I first congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents of this session of the International Labour Conference upon their election and wish them every success in their high office.

Allow me, in the context of the deep and comprehensive Report of the Director-General, to consider some problems of social protection in my country, Estonia.

In our country, as in all other post-communist countries, the transition from centrally planned economies to market economies has created a new situation on the labour market. Some 690,000 people out of the 1.5 million population of Estonia are employed in the national economy, but the employment rate has dropped considerably over recent years.

One of the most influential reasons is the reorganization of the economic structure and of ownership relations. Large-scale privatization and the arrival of new owners have created a basis for more effective utilization of labour, but have has also brought unemployment.

There are 23,000 unemployed, that is in Estonia about 3 per cent of the working population, if we consider officially registered unemployed persons. However, approximately 35,000 are looking for jobs, so the rate can be estimated at 8 per cent.

The drafting of the law on social protection of the unemployed is under way. So is the establishment of an employment fund which comprises contributions by employees and employers and also allocations from the state budget.

The unemployed who have been officially registered are eligible for unemployment compensation. The compensation may not be less than 60 per cent of the established minimum wage, which is the equivalent of US$25 per month. This compensation is paid for 26 weeks. In addition to this, the unemployed have the right to apply for grants for the purpose of refresher training and also for different subsidies, for example starting-capital for entrepreneurship, registering an enterprise, or a patent fee. The above measures are meant to be of help in the process of job creation and to activate the unemployed on the labour market.

Estonia belongs to those countries of Central and Eastern Europe which have decided to take the course of so-called shock therapy in order to improve their economy. A year ago monetary reform was carried out. As a result, we have had considerable success in opening up our economy to free market relations; foreign investors' contributions are growing, as is the export of our products to western markets. But the social cost of economic progress for our people is very high.

Although the inflation rate has stabilized at about 2 per cent per month and the decline of living standards has become slower, the difference between income and consumption capability continues.

The calculated average wage in Estonia is about US$80 per month. Despite the fact that the average income has increased, the number of people with increased income has not grown. Differences in income levels have increased 20 times.

In accordance with an agreement concluded with the IMF, the Estonian Government is continuing to implement salary restrictions within state-owned enterprises.

The price of labour is considerably cheaper in Estonia as compared with other countries and the increase of wages is slower than that of the cost of living.

The Government is facing the problem of how to compensate for the increasing cost of living in order to check the continuing impoverishment of the population.

This problem is more apparent in families with many children, families of the unemployed and the disabled, who are not able to increase their income, most of which is obtained via children's benefits, social maintenance sums and pensions.

With a view to improving the situation, our Government is going to establish an official poverty line which can be redefined to follow changes in the cost of living. The OECD index will serve as a basis for calculating the criteria for social assistance entitlement.

The reform of the social insurance system has a very special importance in the Government's social policy. The new law on state pensions came into force in April of this year. It provides for a gradual rise to the year 2003 of the pensionable age for men from 60 to 65 and for women from 50 to 55.

The new policy will introduce a social security system based on insurance funds to replace the Soviet pay-as-you-go scheme.

The Government of Estonia has paid great attention to the drafting of new laws which will regulate relations between employers and employees on the labour market in accordance with ILO principles. Our wish is to establish real social partnership in the labour market. We consider this an important step towards the democratic civil society we have to restore after five decades of totalitarian communist dictatorship.

The laws concerning collective bargaining and the resolution of conflicts in the workplace were passed by Parliament this spring. The draft law on shop stewards' rights is before Parliament.

After a long break, Estonia has now restored its active membership of the ILO. The Estonian National Committee of the ILO was formed last year. As a result of its work, ILO Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 144 are being prepared for ratification by the Estonian Parliament in the near future.

At the present time tripartite negotiations are coming along. For the first time after 60 years we have the possibility for serious and responsible dialogue between democratic government, labour organizations and employers' unions to consider urgent problems of social security and income policies. We are deeply convinced that the development of tripartite relationships is the proper way for a post-communist country to establish stable democracy and find sound solutions for our complicated social problems.

In our efforts we have met with understanding and support from the ILO and from governments and trade unions of our neighbouring Nordic countries, as well as from many other European countries. Let me express our deepest gratitude for this and our hope for continuing cooperation.

Original Spanish Mr. CORRAL BORRERO (Minister for Labour and Human Resources, Ecuador) – For the past ten months the President of the Republic of Ecuador, the architect Sixto Durán-Ballén, on the decision of his people, has been leading our country. His Government congratulates the President and the other Officers of the Conference on their well-deserved election and expresses its best hopes for the success of this session for the benefit of the world of labour.

The socio-economic conditions and public finances in Ecuador when the Government took office were marked by a deep and severe crisis. The fiscal deficit was in the order of 7 per cent of the GDP. There was a sharp drop in monetary reserves. There were enormous unpaid debts and works suspended, excessive bureaucracy and waste in public expenditures, the State was overstaffed and inefficient, inflation was running at over 60 per cent a year and galloping upwards; there were unresolved social problems, high levels of unemployment and underemployment, infant mortality and malnutrition, migration from rural areas to the cities, delinquency, inadequate and reduced social services, and so on, as a result of which the Government, in carrying out its essential duties and exercising its rights, decided to undertake a process of transformation and change as part of a macroeconomic plan of stabilization involving structural adjustment measures which unfortunately have a high social cost. But the cost would be even higher if these measures were delayed any further and it would be a poor strategy to fail to face up to this crisis.

The basic objective of the plan is to reduce inflation which is, without any doubt, the heaviest burden for our people; to strengthen and bring public finances back to a healthy state; to reduce public expenditure and initiate a process of modernizing the State; to meet the historic challenge of transforming political and social organization away from the forms of state control based on expensive and inefficient structures.

While it is true that combating inflation is the best social measure which can no longer be delayed, it is also true that major social action must be taken simultaneously to benefit the less well off sectors as regards health, education, housing, protection of children and the elderly, training, credit and assistance for small enterprises, etc. The Government has adopted these measures to restore the well-being of our people.

Indeed, one of the most important social measures is clearly that of social security, which has been studied in depth in the Director-General's Report to this session. Solidarity is the underlying and unchanging principle; we welcome any necessary and essential change as long as this basic principle remains intact.

Unfortunately, there are major shortcomings in our social security system to the extent that our Social Security Institute is commonly referred as our "insecurity institute".

The scheme covers only 17 per cent of the national population and 28 per cent of the labour force with only a relative few making use of the benefits. The Peasants' Social Security Fund covers 14 per cent of the rural population, which places the Ecuadorian social security scheme among those with the lowest coverage in Latin America and the Caribbean. Although the primary purpose of social security is to protect those who have nothing other than their own labour to support them against the risks faced by all human beings, such as illness, unemployment, old age and death, the funds available for social security in Ecuador have been largely depleted. As a result, in the past decade there has been a 62 per cent reduction in benefits, whereas administrative expenses increased by 93 per cent to meet the demands of a swollen and inefficient bureaucracy which, repeatedly and illegally paralyses services, including hospital services. Despite the large amounts spent on administration, the latter is deficient because it is bogged down in a legislative morass and excessive centralization devoid of an integrated accounts system and in which the growing ranks of the bureaucracy fail to distinguish themselves by their efficiency. While it is true that the State has an old and heavy unpaid debt to the Social Security Institute, which it will have to honour, it is also clear that the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute urgently needs a radical and thoroughgoing reform which goes beyond the privatization that might be considered appropriate in some services. In this connection it would be very useful to have any technical assistance with which the ILO could provide us.

In the area of labour and social affairs, the philosophy and policy of the Government is threefold. First, to carry out measures to create jobs through social public works and to establish the conditions of justice, security and confidence required to attract foreign and domestic investment. Second, to establish and protect in the medium term a just wage that will meet the vital needs of our people in dignity and decorum, through periodic readjustments while at the same time fighting inflation resolutely and without let. After a decade of wage erosion, when increases were swallowed up by inflation, the present Government has managed to create some kind of balance, since the recent increases have been around 57 per cent in nominal terms and 21 per cent in real terms. Of course, we are aware of the fact that the minimum wage in Ecuador, even when we add to it all of the other compulsory elements which increase it threefold, is insufficient to meet the basic needs of a family. Third, harmony, equity and justice in labour management relations, recognizing and guaranteeing the exercise of rights but also requiring the corresponding obligations be met. We regard capital and labour as necessary complementary factors; capital has a social function to play in creating jobs, collective wealth and in making man the protagonist of all worthwhile action.

As other countries have done, we want to establish a tripartite social pact between the Government, employers and workers to improve the situation of our people. We are determined to fight poverty. We would like to recall that international organizations such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the United Nations Development Programme, etc., met in Washington only a few months ago, along with world-known personalities and ministers of finance and labour, to seek ways and means to achieve the paramount goal of fighting poverty in all its dramatic manifestations which diminish the dignity of human beings.

We would like to take this opportunity to support the concern expressed here by the Minister of Labour of the Republic of Panama regarding the very serious social and economic problem facing the countries of America which produce and export bananas as a result of the restrictions, contrary to the principles of free trade, which are being imposed by the European Economic Community. If this continues, for Ecuador, which is the major exporter of bananas in the world, and for the other countries as well, the impact on the economy will be serious and result in the massive layoff of workers whom the ILO, within its terms of reference, has an obligation to protect.

Ecuador is determined to move forward with the process of Andean integration with the other members of the Andean Pact, Venezuela, Colombia, Peru and Bolivia. It will be a very good idea to standardize and harmonize, so far as possible, labour legislation in these countries. A comparative analysis has already been carried out by the ILO, a valuable contribution for which we express our deepest thanks.

Finally, we would like to stress the very important work being carried out by the ILO to make the world of work a better, more just and human world. After 74 years of fruitful existence, the Organization is growing not only in terms of the number of its Members but in the importance and depth of its actions and proposals which cast an eternal flame that dispels the shadows of injustice that unfortunately still dominate our world.

Mr. IJAZ-UL-HAQ (Minister of Labour, Manpower and Overseas Pakistanis, Pakistan) – In the name of Allah, Merciful and Compassionate.

May I begin by congratulating Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as the President of this august assembly. I also congratulate the two Vice-Presidents on their election. I am confident that under their able leadership the deliberations of this Conference will be highly successful. I would also avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election. We share the confidence reposed in him.

We commend the Director-General's Report Social insurance and social protection. The Report gives a comprehensive overview of the social security programmes in the member countries, outlines a strategy for the further development of these programmes, and suggests measures for member States to adopt to make the social protection and social security more meaningful.

The Director-General has rightly pointed out that the development of social protection is a community affair and, as such, involves the willingness of each individual in a community to contribute to the care of his fellows, who are disadvantaged or in need of support. Grass-roots consensus is, therefore, a prerequisite for the development of the system of social protection. We fully endorse the views of the Director-General that the extension of social security in developing countries is a part and parcel of the broader issue of economic, political and social development.

Pakistan fully recognizes the ILO's valuable contribution in promoting respect for human rights, freedom of association, employment, human resources development, tripartism, vocational training, industrial relations and labour administration, social security and social protection. We believe that progress towards the realization of human rights requires changes in social relationships and the conciliation of conflicting interests. We therefore share the perceptions of the International Labour Organization and fully subscribe to the philosophies inherent in ILO instruments. We are making sincere efforts to implement these instruments in spite of resource constraints and difficult conditions.

It is said that actions speak louder than words. The Government of Pakistan has enacted laws to abolish the bonded labour system and to prohibit the employment of children in hazardous occupations. We are taking concrete steps for the strict enforcement of these laws. Some of the delegates to the Conference have alleged large-scale child labour in Pakistan. I refute this allegation and feel that it is a part of vilification campaign against my country. We do not deny the existence of the problem, but would appreciate if the endeavours of the Government to eradicate the problem were also taken into account.

In our efforts to improve our functioning we are taking steps to further strengthen our ties with the ILO. It gives me pleasure to inform the Conference that my Government has donated a piece of land to the ILO for the construction of its own premises in Islamabad. We acknowledge the appreciation of the member countries of the ILO for this gesture by the Government of Pakistan.

We in Pakistan firmly believe that a society cannot prosper until it strives to remove the gap between the haves and the have-nots. Our religion forbids the uneven distribution of resources and does not permit certain groups within society to live extravagantly, while others suffer in the face of abject poverty. Our Constitution provides for the promotion of the social and economic well-being of all people, irrespective of their sex, caste and creed. It aims at raising the standard of living by preventing the concentration of wealth and the means of production in the hands of a few, and by ensuring equitable rights of employers and employees, landlords and tenants. It further provides compulsory social insurance for all persons employed in the public as well as the private sector, and for the provision of the basic necessities of life such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical relief to all citizens.

In order to fulfil the constitutional provisions and in pursuance of the teachings of Islam, the Government launched a social security scheme which is financed through the contributions of employers only. The old-age benefits scheme is funded by employers and the Government in equal parts.

In Pakistan the social security programme was started piecemeal, as in all other countries of the world, and has made steady progress over the years. The first comprehensive social security scheme covering the contingencies of sickness, maternity, work-related injuries, occupational diseases, invalidity and death was launched in 1965. Initially, the scheme was applied to small units of the textile industry employing 20 or more workers. Gradually, the coverage was extended to other industries and at present the scheme is applicable to all establishments employing ten or more workers receiving wages up to US$55. The Government has in principle decided to raise the wage ceiling to a reasonable limit to expand coverage under the scheme, which is financed through contribution of the employers only.

In 1976, the Government launched another social security scheme covering the contingencies of old age, invalidity and death outside the workplace. This scheme is also applicable to establishments employing ten or more workers, and covers all employees irrespective of their wages, excluding managers. The scheme is financed with employee contributions and matching grants from the Government. The employees make no contribution towards this scheme.

At present, all contingencies recognized under the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), such as sickness, maternity, disability, death and retirement are covered. The only contingencies that are outside the purview of the social security programme are unemployment benefits and family allowances, largely because of the resource constraints and high rate of unemployment in the country. The rate of benefits allowed to the workers for the various contingencies is in conformity with the ILO Convention of 1952.

The provision of adequate health care to the people is the responsibility of the Government. In spite of financial constraints, we are committed to providing health care to the entire population by the year 2000 by setting up rural health centres and basic health units.

In addition to these schemes, Pakistan has also launched a comprehensive social assistance scheme under the Islamic Law of Zakat and Ushr. Under this scheme funds are collected from the affluent sections of the society and distributed among the needy and the downtrodden sections of the society. About 1 million individuals and families are receiving monthly subsistence allowances from this fund.

Another Islamic fund, namely Bait-ul-Mal, was established in 1991. It make it compulsory for the State to provide basic necessities to people who are permanently or temporarily unable to earn their livelihood on account of sickness, unemployment or circumstances beyond their control.

Pakistan is fully conscious of the need to extend the coverage provided under the schemes of social protection and social security, to enhance the benefits, to reform the institutions and management of the schemes and to achieve cohesion between the various components of the system at both the policy and operational level. However, apart from the constraints mentioned by the Director-General in his Report, there are certain disturbing factors that divert our attention from these goals and impede our efforts. One of these factors is our geopolitical situation. Since the objective of social development can only be attained in a climate of peace and tranquility, the ILO has a duty to ascertain the reasons which may be inhibiting any country from making progress in programmes of greater social protection. In our case, the situation of constant unrest prevailing along our frontiers is a major obstacle in the way of our efforts. The gross violations of human rights by the Indian forces in the Indian-occupied State of Jammu and Kashmir are consistently diverting our attention and resources from our own national social objectives.

As human beings we ought to be moved by the situation in Indian-occupied Kashmir where the civil, political, social, cultural and economic rights of workers are being violated. Forced displacement of labour, in violation of ILO Conventions, and arbitrary arrests and torture have seriously hampered the economic conditions of people in Indian-occupied Kashmir. The population of the Indian-occupied territory, which mainly comprises the working class, is struggling to keep their bodies and souls together. They have no work, no employment and no safety. The work relationship has totally collapsed.

The situation in Indian-occupied Kashmir is a challenge for the conscience of the world community. This Conference must rise to the occasion and urge the ILO to take the initiative and send a fact-finding mission to the Indian-occupied territory where, under a virtual blackout, the local population is suffering from untold misery, hardship and injustice. Such action on the part of the ILO, I am sure, would be highly acclaimed.

Instances of gross violation of human rights continue to occur also in other parts of the world, specifically in Bosnia and in occupied Arab territories. The acts of barbarism perpetrated upon the people of Bosnia, including a large majority of the workforce, are shameful. The ILO should and must raise its voice against the atrocities being committed against these workers.

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate Pakistan's total support for the fundamental rights of peoples to self-determination, and urge the international community to take immediate steps to protect basic human rights, particularly in Indian-occupied Jammu and Kashmir, Bosnia and Palestine. We feel that the free exercise of this fundamental right in accordance with the relevant United Nations resolutions is the sine qua non for peace in the countries and territories concerned.

Mr. TIRUMURTI (Government adviser, India) – The delegation of India would like to exercise its right of reply at the next sitting of the plenary. We request the secretariat to make a note of this.

Original Farsi: Mr. KAMALI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May I begin by congratulating the President on his election as President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to welcome the participation of the new ILO Members in the present Conference.

Social security stands on our Conference agenda at a time when not only the international organizations and their regional institutions but also national labour administrations and the social partners are faced with new situations which have arisen as a result of recent developments at global, regional and national level and which affect the working and living conditions of whole populations in various countries.

The Director-General's Report suggests that the setting up or reconstructing of systems of generalized social protection at a level consistent with the current state of development of the countries concerned, particularly in the developing countries, is one of the major tasks of economic development. At the same time, as a result of the inequity of international and regional relations which are rooted in history, many underdeveloped countries are still deprived of the most basic prerequisites of human development. Despite the fact that most of these countries are rich in natural resources which have been constantly exploited by the industrialized countries, they are afflicted by poverty and commonplace diseases. In many cases, the people of those countries do not even have access to safe water and adequate food, let alone employment, education, or health care. If the status quo is to be perpetuated in future, if the developing countries are to go on being regarded merely as a market for the products of the industrialized North, without regard to human principle, and if the issues of technology transfer and the need for social security and the readjustment of employment structures are to be disregarded in the course of economic structural adjustment, then clearly national and regional social fabrics will be destabilized and international peace and security will be jeopardized to the detriment of all.

Now more than ever, it is vitally important to identify the root causes of the development lag evident in most parts of the world and of the ever widening development gap between countries, and to analyse the problems, explain the new necessities and look for appropriate solutions at the international, regional and national levels, in order to make strategies and policies more meaningful.

The process of generalizing social protection, reforming institutional structures, improving management and removing obstacles pertaining mostly to the informal sector and a narrow tax base, are challenges which need to be tackled at the national level in the countries concerned. Similarly, the contribution of all in those areas must be regarded as a universal issue and a matter of international responsibility.

The achievement of the objectives set out in the Director-General's Report, at a level consistent with the desired standards, not only presupposes the expansion and promotion of international, regional or multi-bilateral technical cooperation, but also adequate financial contributions. The relevant institutions in the industrialized countries should take on a greater share of responsibility in both the protective programmes and the transfer of technology and know-how.

If the international will really exists to achieve social objectives and find solutions to the complex issues we now face, at a time when the Cold War has ended and international institutions and their respective member States are undergoing some form of structural adjustment, then the huge expenditure once devoted to military purposes could well be redirected to funding social protection and to developing and equipping the associated systems in developing and disadvantaged countries. Those countries are facing problems which have arisen in the wake of structural adjustment, including increased social expenditure and the need to devote greater resources to vulnerable groups, as well as their new requirements and employment problems.

The same resources can also be used for the transfer of technical know-how and hardware to those countries which are confronted, as a result of economic structural adjustment, by large numbers of unemployed and a lack of sufficient training for their re-employment. This would enable them to avert social disorder or political tension which may result from such changes.

It should be mentioned, at this juncture, that as recently as April 1993, the 13th Conference of Asian and Pacific Labour Ministers in Teheran outlined the new role of labour administrations in the light of the changed circumstances, and affirmed the importance of developing social security and achieving general social protection coverage. The emphasis in this was on tripartism and the key role that labour administrations shall have to play in those areas, while it was also emphasized that the ILO should intensify and further promote its positive collaboration with the funding institutions and agencies concerned, to ensure that the social objectives which concern both social policy makers and labour administrations and the social partners will be incorporated in their policies at an early stage.

It is imperative that, when discussing the Conference agenda items on social security, access to suitable employment and appropriate technical and vocational training, particular attention should be paid to local factors which are not conducive to achieving the ultimate goal of social justice.

It is also vital for the ILO to advocate the transfer of technical know-how to the developing countries, and access to appropriate technical and vocational education.

Apartheid in South Africa remains a factor in the substantial neglect of the social and human rights of that people, which deprives them of appropriate opportunities for development. The working conditions of workers and employers in Palestine and the Occupied Territories, as well as the situation imposed upon the oppressed people of Bosnia-Herzegovina, whose human rights continue to be grossly violated and who have been denied all access to social justice and security, are also issues of concern which call for the particular attention of the international community if the just solution so urgently needed is to be found.

Thank you for your attention, and peace be with you all.

Mr. GHARIB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have pleasure in conveying to you the best wishes of the workers of Iraq for the success of this Conference. I should also like to congratulate the President of this session on the great confidence shown in him by this gathering and to wish him every success in guiding the proceedings of our Conference. My warmest congratulations also to the other officers, to whom I wish every success in their work. I further wish to congratulate the new Members of the Organization and also the Arab people of Eritrea who have just achieved independence. We welcome the presence of a representative of the Eritrean Government at our Conference.

As we hold this session of the Conference to discuss issues relating to work and workers and to devise standards and find ways and means of improving their situation and overcoming their difficulties, the workers of Iraq are undergoing terrible sufferings in the form of famine, unemployment and deprivation as factories are closed down, and shortages of basic materials and medical supplies because of the unjust economic embargo imposed on Iraq in violation of the most basic human rights.

As human rights slogans are bandied about, people are still bent on exterminating an entire people and using a policy of starvation to impose political views – an attitude totally at variance with the slogans regarding human rights. The workers of Iraq and their children and families, who are faced with destruction and genocide, have therefore called on me to tell you of their sufferings so that you may call for the raising of the unjust and inhuman embargo, especially since there is no further justification whatsoever for continuing it . . .

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – Please confine yourself to the subject under discussion which is the Director-General's Report on social security and social protection. Please continue.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – This is not a point of order. What I am telling you about is contrary to human rights. As I was saying, the workers, children and families of Iraq, who are faced with genocide, have asked me to tell you of their sufferings so that you may call for the raising of the inhuman embargo, especially since there is no longer any justification for it. What is happening in Iraq is a form of genocide, which is outlawed by international humanitarian law. We therefore wish to remind everyone that the people of Iraq have rendered great services to humanity. Down through the ages they have helped to build civilization. Fairness and justice, and a sense of human responsibility, demand that we stand up to the forces who wish to destroy the basis of the civilization of this ancient people for purely material reasons, to get their hands on the region and plunder its wealth. From this rostrum I therefore call on the Director-General of the ILO to assume his responsibilities and to come to the support and assistance of the workers of Iraq, alleviating their sufferings under these harsh circumstances . . .

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – The speaker is requested to yield to the point of order please. The delegation of Kuwait has raised a point of order. The speaker is requested to keep to the subject under discussion.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – The delegate of Kuwait can only speak at the end of my statement. He must therefore listen to me and he can raise his point of order when I have finished speaking.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – The delegation of Kuwait has raised a point of order. The speaker is requested to keep to the agenda.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – There is an accepted rule whereby a point of order should be raised when a speaker has finished speaking. We were informed at the beginning of the session that there would be no point of order but a right to reply at the end of the statement.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – There has been a misunderstanding. Please keep to the agenda.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – A point of order was raised this afternoon by the delegate of the United States. The representative of the United States of America was allowed to raise his point of order. My point of order is that the speaker has strayed completely away from the Director-General's Report and thus I would like him to be reminded that he must keep to the subject, which is the Report of the Director-General. He should not talk about an embargo, since this is a matter for the Security Council. He has no right to raise this question here.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – The problem of the embargo is relevant. I wish to speak of the sufferings of the besieged Iraqi workers. The Iraqi people cherishes its dignity and refuses to accept colonialist domination and hegemony. It has made enormous sacrifices to counter the aggression perpetrated against all the nerve centres of the country. Cultures have been destroyed by the planes of aggressors who have respected no international charter and who have waged acts of unprecedented barbarity.

The agenda of this session includes a number of very important subjects. The subject of social insurance which appears in the Director-General's Report is of particular importance because it opens up strategic perspectives which will enable us to resolve one of the most difficult problems facing workers and the world of work. The improvement of social protection is of the utmost importance for workers who need programmes that will extend protection in all spheres.

In the second Part of his Report the Director-General discusses ILO activities over the past year. We should like to emphasize that the Arab region needs greater attention and we would like to recall once again that the workers of Iraq need the assistance provided by ILO activities.

As regards the third item on the agenda, concerning the ratification of international labour Conventions and Recommendations, we stress the need for efforts to be made to enhance the ILO's effectiveness in this sphere so as to achieve the largest possible number of ratifications, particularly of Conventions concerning trade union freedoms, and to ensure that signatory States actually apply them.

We have studied the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, and believe that greater attention should be given to this so as to meet the real needs of developing countries.

As concerns the Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa, we reaffirm our support for the people and workers of South Africa in their fight against racial discrimination.

Although the sufferings of Iraq workers following the unjust embargo imposed upon them are beyond rapid description, the most terrible thing is the recourse to double standards in relations with States. This can be seen every day in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, since Security Council Resolution No. 799 concerning the repatriation of expelled Palestinians remains a dead letter. Furthermore, the suffering of the people in Bosnia and Herzegovina is worsening every day at a time when international law is being illegally used to take revenge on the Iraqi people in the pursuit of hegemony by the United States in the Arab region.

In conclusion I would like to thank all the international organizations which have helped to bring and continue to bring humanitarian assistance to the workers and people of Iraq.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – Another point of order was raised by the delegation of Kuwait which was not allowed by the Chair. Instead, Mr. Al-Kandary, Workers' delegate of Kuwait, has requested the right of reply to Mr. Gharib's statement, which will be allowed at the end of the sitting.

Original Russian: Mr. KASKEVITCH (Minister of Labour, Ukraine) – Permit me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them every success at this session of the Conference.

I hope that the exchange of views on the issues included on our agenda will contribute to a further improvement in the efficiency of the activities of the ILO and help to solve current problems concerning labour issues and social security.

One such question, no doubt, is the problem of social protection. We welcome and appreciate the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on this subject. The ILO is once again drawing attention to social questions and their resolution and thus showing how capable it is of taking an effective stand against problems which emerge in the world. These questions are now of particular relevance to my country which has been a Member of the ILO for almost 40 years, but only in the past two years has it embarked upon independent development.

One of the most important prerequisites for the success of reforms in Ukraine is the development of a qualitative policy on social protection for the population.

At the same time, we are at the stage where the introduction of market relations and structural reform, which are laying the long-term foundations for an improvement in the welfare of the population, are leading to unavoidable social costs during the transitional period. In our country, this has taken the form of a fall in production and higher unemployment, which has made the financial situation concerning social security even worse.

However, we do not want to dramatize the situation and are trying to work together in Ukraine to minimize the inevitable costs of transition. In its strategy for the transitional period, the Government is trying to take preventive action with regard to social protection. It is trying to create new machinery based on labour motivation, on protecting incomes at a time of price liberalization, on establishing a tripartite social partnership to take the lead in regulating social and labour relations, and on an active state employment policy. A universal system of social protection is being advocated, but at the same time, provision must be made for different ways to implement such protection with respect to the different sectors of the population.

Social security includes all forms of protection provided for the elderly, the disabled, children, single mothers, large families, the unemployed and individuals in the event of illness, the loss of the family breadwinner, accident, industrial disease, etc.

Pensions and benefits are the most important element of the social security system. In Ukraine, the question of state pensions and allowances has been dealt with in the past two years and resulted in legislation on pensions, on pensions for servicemen, on the status and social protection of citizens injured in the Chernobyl disaster and on employment.

Alongside labour benefits and pensions the right to a social pension has been enshrined in law. The main aim of these pensions and allowances is to provide a basic living income for persons who are unable to work, in cases where they do not qualify for any other form of pension or benefit.

Naturally, the transition to a market economy has painfully highlighted the problem of providing social protection for the disadvantaged parts of Ukraine's population. Much of this population is living in young, single-parent families or in families with many children. One of our tasks is thus to provide a minimum of material conditions for them.

To provide minimum means of existence for the disadvantaged, the Ukranian Parliament in November 1992 adopted an Act concerning state assistance for families with children. It sets a state-guaranteed level of material assistance for families with children and provides benefits, taking into consideration the family's composition, income, age and children's health, etc.

The system of benefits established by the Act is based on the following principles of the State's family policy: that the child's interests are the priority, regardless of where or by whom he or she is raised; that social guarantees should be strengthened for families which for objective reasons are unable to provide for themselves. Benefits have thus been introduced for children up to the age of 16 (18 for those in school), and in addition paid leave is provided after birth until the child reaches the age of 3. Other benefits are also provided.

Social protection in Ukraine thus covers all forms of risk.

At the same time, the economic transformations now taking shape have underlined the need to restructure the general social protection system in order to bring it up to a level commensurate with the country's stage of development. A "Social Insurance Reform Concept" has been prepared in Ukraine. It calls for a pension plan, health insurance, occupational accident insurance and unemployment insurance under both mandatory and voluntary social security schemes.

We thus can note with satisfaction how similar the orientations of the ILO's activities mentioned in the Report of the Director-General are to those measures undertaken in Ukraine in the field of social security and social protection.

We are looking forward to the opportunity to benefit from international cooperation, to make use of the ILO's experience in social protection, and to profit from the help of its specialists in preparing standard-setting and legislative bases and in carrying out practical measures in the field of industrial relations.

The Report of the Director-General on the activities of the ILO in 1992 rightly points out the need to bring the ILO closer to its tripartite partners by means of a greater understanding of their priorities and needs. To do so we believe it is necessary to strengthen the influence of the Organization's regional structures. We believe that it is appropriate to set up an ILO regional office in one of the eastern European countries. Such an office would be able to cover the growing number of countries in that region which are now joining our Organization.

I should like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Government of Ukraine, to express our sincere gratitude to the International Labour Office for its assistance in helping to solve our country's social and labour problems. I am certain that our cooperation will develop further in the future.

Mrs. LAVNIC-WAINSTEAD (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) – I am honoured to have the opportunity to address the International Labour Conference today, on behalf of the staff not only of the International Labour Office but also of the Food and Agriculture Organization, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the International Atomic Energy Agency, the International Agency for Research on Cancer, the International Civil Aviation Organization, the International Fund for Agricultural Development, the International Maritime Organization, the International Telecommunications Union, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, the Universal Postal Union, the World Health Organization, the World Intellectual Property Organization, the World Meteorological Organization, the International Fund for Agricultural Development, the World Food Programme and the World Tourism Organization. The staff associations and unions of these organizations together form the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA), of which I am proud to be the President.

As the "A" at the end of FICSA implies, most of its members are associations rather than unions. The difference is, perhaps, subtle; I can assure you, however, that it most certainly does not reflect a less committed, less determined, or even less militant approach to staff representational functions, but rather an acute awareness of the gulf between unions outside the United Nations system and staff representational bodies within.

Many staff representatives come like me from countries where trade unions have been responsible for bringing about major reforms in working conditions since the turn of the century. We know that what makes real unions effective is real bargaining power. Unfortunately, the United Nations system has a long way to go before FICSA can make that important jump from being a federation of staff associations to a federation of staff unions, and a number of seemingly insurmountable obstacles have to be overcome.

Firstly, there is the myth that international civil servants are a special breed of financially independent do-gooders, who with missionary zeal are prepared to give their lives – some literally – in the service of the United Nations. They are not expected to worry about deteriorating conditions of service, the heavy losses in purchasing power of their salaries and dwindling pensions. It is considered poor taste for international civil servants to peruse their pay slips, let alone question the level of their remuneration. To protest, to take action, to strike; this is definitely not in keeping with the role of the self-sacrificing, self-effacing little servant which many member States would like to assign to us. Please do not misunderstand me – we are in the employment of the United Nations in order to provide a service and, as I pointed out recently to the Advisory Committee on Coordination, we did not join the United Nations to make our fortunes.

Second, any union worth its salt needs a negotiating partner. This is usually the employer. In the case of the international civil service, however, we have a dilemma: who are our employers? The executive heads of the individual agencies are responsible for the day-to-day administration of our different organizations; the members of the International Civil Service Commission, the ICSC, regulate our conditions of service; the member States hold the purse-strings, which in turn influences the other two parties. The strength of any union lies in its ability to exert pressure, but on whom should the international civil service exert pressure? The Fifth Committee of the General Assembly and the ICSC pass the buck to and fro, while executive heads wring their hands at the growing impossibility of recruiting and retaining staff of the requisite calibre, and the governing bodies of the specialized agencies meeting in plenary nod wisely and make sympathetic noises. Each declares the other responsible for the current problems facing the staff and organizations, and none is prepared to shoulder the blame. In the absence of true negotiation, FICSA has, for a long time, been pressing for a more meaningful consultative process with the International Civil Service Commission. Last year, it concentrated its efforts on providing technical inputs to the specific items of the agenda before the Commission. FICSA experts have also played what one imagines would be a useful task for the Commission: that of verifying calculations and statistics and where necessary submitting corrections. In all, a considerable amount of time, effort and expense was deployed in raising the level of staff inputs beyond the political to the substantive. To no avail. The Commission in its wisdom chose to ignore the staff's presentations and instead settled for politically expediant decisions, which would be sure to find support in the Fifth Committee of the United Nations General Assembly. Finally, FICSA came to the realization that dummy participation was a waste of time for all concerned, and decided to boycott sessions of the Commission until such time as it believed participation would be constructive and meaningful.

As a third obstacle, our paymasters the member States hold a secret weapon which is out of reach of governments in their dealings with their national civil services. They can and do withdraw from individual agencies when the going gets rough. Although idealogical differences may be given as the reason, it usually boils down to a basic problem of pounds and pence. The impact on the budget of the organizations concerned is devastating. Global recession is felt both in Member States' insistence on zero growth budgets and in the delay with which they pay their assessed contributions. Budgetary constraints are not only threatening the staff's career expectations, but undermining important programmes and effectively blocking staff from performing those services for which they were recruited. The ultimate losers are the developing countries.

A fourth handicap to the existence of true unions within the United Nations system is the character of international service. Most staff members of the specialized agencies in the United Nations system are employed under contracts of one, two or sometimes five years' duration. Permanent contracts in many organizations are a thing of the past. In order to take up employment in the United Nations system, many staff members have had to break their national ties, interrupt their careers, uproot their families and move to a country where lifestyle, culture, climate, education and attitude towards foreigners may be very different from their own. Having taken that step, many are naturally anxious to extend their period of employment beyond the initial one or two years. They know that a core of experienced, specialized staff constitute the backbone of the organization. Yet rather than encourage the growth of such a core group, the administrations of some organizations hold the promise of a new contract, or the threat of a non-renewed contract, over the heads of staff. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that for many affiliation with a staff union in the true sense of the word is a daunting and dangerous prospect.

These are indeed major hurdles, and FICSA would appreciate all the help, guidance and advice it can get from the real specialists – members of the International Labour Conference.

The right to negotiate conditions of service has been FICSA's main goal for a number of years. Newcomers to the ILO Conference may be surprised to learn that something which is taken for granted in most enterprises throughout the world, public and private sector alike, is sadly lacking in the United Nations system. For an organization which purports to show others the way to achieve a healthier, safer and more equitable tomorrow, the United Nations is lagging far behind in the area of staff management relations. The situation differs to some extent from one organization to another: in some organizations staff representatives have regular access to their executive heads. Others have to wait several years for an appointment. In the more enlightened agencies, including the ILO, there is established staff management machinery to advise the executive head on matters pertaining to personnel or staff welfare issues, and staff representatives have been able to negotiate for example the introduction of longevity and merit steps, flexible and part-time working hours, the timing of General Service salary increments or, in isolated cases, measures to combat the erosion of pensions. In other organizations there is, believe it or not, no formal staff management dialogue, and the most the staff have ever been able to negotiate is half a day off on New Year's Eve.

While the ICSC has spent days discussing the pensionable remuneration of ungraded officials, and has tried to legislate on a whole range of issues from health insurance to language incentives for Professionals to the reward of merit, it has studiously avoided the issue of the rights of staff. In its recent history at least, it has never discussed the introduction of staff management consultative machinery in the different organizations nor recommended minimum standards. If and when FICSA ever resumes participation in the work of the Commission, it may suggest that an appropriate item be included on the agenda.

Finally, FICSA's current motto is "No Staff, No UN", and this has been chanted in the streets of Manhattan and emblazoned in enamel on lapel pins. The message is simple – but not simplistic. Obvious – yet not fully grasped. It may appear threatening to some, but for the 30,000 members of FICSA it is a reality. The United Nations system cannot survive without good-quality human resources. These in turn cannot be assured unless the system is competitive and the attitude of United Nations organizations towards staff/management relations is brought rapidly up to date. All eyes are turned to the International Labour Organization to lead the way.

Original French: Mr. MEKIDECHE (Employers' delegate, Algeria) – I am honoured to be given the chance to address the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. First and foremost, I should like to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his brilliant election as the President of this session, and to congratulate the Vice-Presidents as well.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for his re-election as Director-General of the ILO.

I commend the Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, which deals with questions that concern Algerian employers very deeply.

Before commenting on the Report, I would like to describe a few aspects of the economic situation in Algeria which affect the evolution and treatment of social questions.

Our Conference is taking place against a backdrop of change and worldwide recession. The situation, characterized by the globalization of the economy, requires painful economic restructuring both for developing and industrialized countries.

As the Egyptian Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, you, Mr. President, understand the constraints experienced by developing countries. Algeria, as many other countries, is in full transition towards a market economy. As employers, we are also suffering the consequences of adjustments. By way of example, the devaluation of our currency to make it convertible, has made imported inputs and spare parts more expensive. You know that this will also have repercussions on consumer prices, especially since incomes have fallen. This crisis is rendered even more difficult by our debt burden. In 1992 the servicing of our debt consumed 75 per cent of our hard currency earnings. As a consequence, the remaining foreign exchange is allocated to the most pressing social needs, and enterprises often are left without foreign currency with which to purchase necessary inputs from abroad. The social consequences are obvious: not only are we unable to create new employment, but we also lose jobs as enterprises operate far below capacity.

Managing the constraints imposed by the debt is also the responsibility of international institutions and developed countries. The adjustment of the Algerian economy is being thwarted by two constraints: first, the social constraint, which I will come back to in my comments on the Report of the Director-General. Secondly, the financial constraint of our foreign debt, which we are servicing at great economic and social cost.

Our conviction is that the doctrines concerning the treatment of the debt need to be re-examined by the international institutions in the light of adjustments and rescheduling in developing countries.

We cannot hope to find solutions to social problems and unemployment if these constraints are not lifted. In point of fact, these constraints also hamper the adjustment of our economies, and efforts to render them efficient and to create new employment.

In my country, many do not understand why, in spite of our resources (we are the leading supplier of natural gas in Western Europe) and the fact that we pay between 7,000 and 8,000 billion dollars per year to service our debt, no initiatives are being undertaken by the international financial community to ease this constraint.

As far as the social constraint is concerned, the Report of the Director-General recalls that the Algerian "social security system followed a European model".

I subscribe fully to the analysis of the Director-General that two types of causes are responsible for the crisis of social protection systems in the developing countries. First, the small financing base. Secondly, the inefficient management of social security.

However, the adjustments introduced in my country have raised a new problem: how to deal with redundant workers. We employers hope to be given technical assistance by the ILO and other international organizations in order to set up an unemployment benefit scheme, to reduce the negative consequences of industrial restructuring which leads to the loss of jobs. In the same vein, we believe that the relocation of industry and services to our country should be encouraged by our authorities, in particular through the creation of a more favourable climate for investment and the promulgation of a suitable foreign investment code.

We Algerian employers believe very strongly in the synergy of partnership.

Just as it is vain to think that we can solve the problem of unemployment, especially of the young in the short term, it is impossible to neglect this question and its political and social impact.

Therefore, the Algerian employers favour flexibility, part-time work and fixed-term contracts, once suitable protection for workers is provided, as means to fight unemployment. A positive and pragmatic approach to these forms of employment is necessary and should be supported by all social partners.

In conclusion, I wished simply to emphasize the organic links that exist between the economic transformation in my country and the social consequences. The success of our adjustment process is linked to the efficiency of social programmes drawn up in a tripartite forum. At the same time it is also linked to the problem of the debt. Economic efficiency and social justice are consistent with the Constitution of the ILO, but depend mutually on one another.

I am quite sure that we all share this will to realize these objectives, for without economic efficiency there can be no social justice.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Tabani) – I now give the floor to Mr. Al-Kandary who has requested for a right of reply to the statement of the Iraqi delegate. May I inform him that he must please try to use parliamentary language and restrict his right of reply to two minutes only.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KANDARY (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Kuwait) – In fact, at the beginning of the statement of the representative of Iraq, I asked for the floor on a point of order under Article 14 of the Standing Orders and in particular paragraphs 4 and 5. Paragraph 4 states that the President may withdraw the right of speech from a speaker and paragraph 5 says that every delegate has the right to raise a point of order and that the President should give him the floor immediately. I repeat, the wording says "immediately". I asked for the floor on a point of order because the speaker did not keep to the agenda item under discussion, that is to say the discussion of the Director-General's Report, and if I ask for a right of reply it is not because the Iraqi delegate did not confine his statement to the subject under discussion but because he reported to the Conference some falsehoods concerning the economic embargo.

As you all know, the economic embargo was imposed by resolutions adopted by the United Nations, and this is a specialized agency of the United Nations. The Security Council of the United Nations is a higher body than the ILO and it is not for the ILO to discuss decisions which have been taken by the United Nations Security Council.

As for the embargo and the United Nations resolutions in that respect, the Iraqi Government is permitted to sell a certain part of its oil production to buy medicine and food. But it has refused to do so. The United Nations resolution does not prevent Iraq from importing food and medicine and such supplies are coming to Iraq in large shipments, in accordance with the United Nations resolutions. Moreover, the United Nations sent officials to Iraq to help that country's people.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – You have exceeded your allotted time. Please conclude your statement immediately.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KANDARY – Excuse me. The Iraqi Government requested United Nations officials to help them. In our opinion, it is incumbent on the Iraqi Government to observe all United Nations resolutions if the embargo is to be lifted. Among the United Nations resolutions is one on the release of prisoners of war, including some trade unionists. Some Kuwaitis are still in Iraqi prisons, in spite of the resolution taken by the United Nations.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.15 p.m.)

Report of the Standing Orders Committee

1. The Standing Orders Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 2 June 1993, held one sitting. It was composed of 48 members (27 Government members, 4 Employers' members and 17 Workers' members).

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Tudor Mircea (Government member, Romania);

Vice-Chairmen: Miss Cornélie Hak (Employers' member, Netherlands); Mr. Khurshid Ahmed (Workers' member, Pakistan).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 80th Session (Provisional Record No. 2) which proposed certain amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

4. At the invitation of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General introduced the amendments before the Committee. He explained that, although this did not appear from Provisional Record No. 2, they were the result of a major and indeed historical task undertaken by a Working Party of the Governing Body under the Chairmanship of Mrs. Caron, the representative of the Government of Canada, in order to adapt the Conference to the new realities and needs of the time. This Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference had made recommendations, which had been accepted by the Governing Body, for a fairly radical restructuring of the Conference. The amendments before the Committee had to be considered in the context of this reform, which comprised two types of change: a shortening of the Conference and a lightening of its workload.

5. The changes designed to shorten the Conference were not directly before the Committee because they did not call for Standing Orders amendments, but they were significant. In future the Conference would start on a Tuesday at 11 a.m. and would finish on the Friday of the third week, the Governing Body meeting on the Saturday. This would represent a shortening by five days as compared with the standard programme and four days as against the reduced programme already in operation.

6. The amendments before the Committee gave effect to decisions of the Governing Body on the recommendation of the Working Party designed to lighten and rationalize the workload of the Conference. They introduced two changes of substance.

7. The first change was to rationalize the various reports before the Conference on the activities of the Organization. At present, the Conference plenary had before it every year the report of the Director-General on the activities of the Organization and the steps taken to give effect to resolutions and the report of the Governing Body on its work, and every second year a report on programme implementation during the preceding biennium. These reports overlapped to a considerable extent and would be replaced by a single consolidated report every two years in non-budget years. In place of the Governing Body's written report, the Chairman of the Governing Body would report orally each year on the work of the Governing Body at the beginning of the general discussion in plenary. These changes called for an amendment to Article 11*bis* to delete the reference to "information on programme implementation during the preceding financial period" and for amendments to Article 12 to provide for the new consolidated report in non-budgetary years. In budgetary years the Director-General's report would deal with a social policy theme. It was also provided that even in budgetary years reports would be submitted on subjects on which the Conference had specifically requested an annual report. At present this related only to the report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories but it could have other applications in the future. A consequential amendment was also necessary to Article 25 relating to the oral report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the work of the Governing Body.

8. The second change concerned the Resolutions Committee which in future would meet only every second year, in non-budgetary years. The possibility of submitting resolutions on urgent matters in budgetary years was, however, retained, and it was agreed that it should be applied in a more flexible manner than hitherto. It would be for the officers of the Conference to make recommendations as to how resolutions which they permitted under the urgency procedure should be examined. These changes required amendments to Article 17, paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. An amendment to paragraph 6 was also proposed to take account of the changed timetable for the Conference described above.

9. Finally, the Governing Body had proposed that a Note should be included at the end of the Standing Orders concerning their application to Maritime Sessions of the Conference. This Note indicated the adaptations which were necessary to certain provisions of the Standing Orders in their application to such sessions and identified the provisions which were not applicable.

10. The Chairman stated that as a member of the Governing Body he could testify to the vast amount of work that had been put into the discussions and negotiations leading up to these amendments, both in the Working Party and in the Governing Body itself. The proposals before the Committee reflected the agreement reached between the three groups, which it would not really be appropriate to bring into question now by putting forward new arguments. At this stage the task of the Committee was rather technical and legal, on the basis of the work already accomplished.

11. The Employers' members supported the objectives of shortening the Conference and lightening its workload. They drew attention to the amendment they had proposed in the Governing Body Committee to the text prepared by the Office so as to safeguard annual reports specifically requested by the Conference, and expressed their support for all the amendments before the Committee.

12. The Workers' members welcomed the presence at the Committee of the Chairman of the Governing Body Working Party which, as a result of lengthy deliberations, had reached unanimous agreement on the changes reflected in the proposed amendments. While the Workers were keen to make the Conference more efficient and lighten its workload, this should not lessen the quality of the work done for the benefit of the workers. A reduction in length without loss of quality would benefit participants who found it difficult to stay for such a long time in Geneva. The savings from shortening the Conference should be devoted to technical cooperation programmes for developing countries. Finally, they drew attention to paragraph 7(b)(iii) of the Final Report of the Working Party on the Improvement of the Functioning of the Conference. One vital element for the Workers in the package deal on which final agreement was reached was that, if the Resolutions Committee was to meet only in non-budgetary years, in budget years when it did not meet, > without prejudice to the authority of the Governing Body to determine the nature and number of the technical items on the agenda of the Conference, one of the technical items on the Conference's agenda would be devoted to the revision and updating of an existing standard and, noting the practice which has existed for the past several years of placing on the agenda two standard-setting items and a general discussion item, the Working Party recommends that this revision and updating of an existing standard would replace, or be the subject of, the general discussion item.

13. The Government member of Canada supported all the amendments proposed. As the Chairman of the Working Party, she confirmed that the recommendation referred to by the Workers' members had formed part of the agreement in the Working Party and the unanimous recommendations accepted by the Governing Body, it being understood that this was without prejudice to the authority of the Governing Body to decide on the agenda of the Conference each year.

14. There being no other observations, the Committee unanimously approved the following draft amendments to the Conference Standing Orders and submits them to the Conference for adoption:[1]

Article 11bis

Procedure for the consideration of the programme and budget

1. Unchanged.

[2. At its session in the first year of a financial period, the Conference shall examine information on programme implementation during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning.]

[3.] 2. For [the purposes indicated in paragraphs 1 and 2 above] this purpose, the Conference may as appropriate appoint a tripartite committee to report to it.

Article 12

Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General

1. During the session at the times fixed by the Selection Committee the Conference shall discuss the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on its work and the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the [activities of the Organization as well as on the steps taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General to give effect to the decisions of the Conference at its previous sessions and the results achieved.] subjects specified in paragraph 2 below.

2. At each session of the Conference in the first year of a biennial financial period, the Director-General shall report on programme implementation and the activities of the Organization during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning as well as information on the steps taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General to give effect to the decisions of the Conference at its previous sessions and the results achieved. At each session preceding the beginning of a financial period, the said report shall be devoted to a social policy theme of current interest chosen by the Director-General, without prejudice to other questions on which the Conference may have requested the Director-General to report to it on an annual basis.

Article 25

1. Unchanged.

[2. In his opening address, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall present the report of the Governing Body on its work.]

[3.] 2. Unchanged.

[4.] 3. Unchanged.

[5.] 4. Unchanged.

5. At the opening of the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall report to the Conference on the work of the Governing Body during the preceding year.

Article 17

Resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda

1. (1) Subject to paragraph 2 below, no resolution relating to a matter not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body shall be moved at [any sitting] the session of the Conference preceding the beginning of a biennial financial period. Such resolutions may be moved at other sessions of the Conference [unless] provided that a copy of the resolution has been deposited with the Director-General of the International Labour Office at least 15 days before the opening of the session of the Conference, by a delegate to the Conference.

(2) Unchanged.

(3) Unchanged.

2. The President may, with the approval of the three Vice-Presidents, permit a resolution relating to a matter not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body to be moved, although it [has not been deposited as required by] would not be otherwise receivable under paragraph 1(1), if it relates either to urgent matters or to matters of an entirely formal nature. If permission is given, the Officers shall also make a recommendation to the Conference as to the manner in which the said resolution is to be considered before submission to the Conference.

3. Subject to paragraph 2 above, all resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body shall be referred by the Conference for report to a Resolutions Committee unless the Conference, on the recommendation of the Selection Committee, decides that a particular resolution relates to a matter for which another committee is competent and refers it to that other committee.

. . . .

6. The Resolutions Committee shall begin its work as soon as possible after the opening of the session of the Conference, in order to enable it to complete its agenda, and shall terminate its work not later than at 6 p.m. on the [third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing] last Saturday of the session. [Rest of paragraph unchanged.]

. . . .

15. The Committee also recommends the Conference to insert the following Note at the end of the Standing Orders:

NOTE FOR MARITIME SESSIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

The above Standing Orders apply to all sessions of the International Labour Conference. However, their application to maritime sessions of the Conference is subject to the adjustments set out below:

Articles 7, 7 bis and 11 bis of the Standing Orders are not applicable.

Article 12, paragraph 2: The Report of the Director-General deals with the activities of the Organization in the maritime sector and recent developments affecting that sector.

Article 17, paragraph 1 (1): The first sentence of this paragraph does not apply to maritime sessions.

Article 17, paragraph 6: The time for completion of the work of the Resolutions Committee may have to be fixed by the Conference on the recommendation of the Selection Committee, having regard to the date fixed for the closing of the session.

Article 25, paragraph 5: The Chairman of the Governing Body reports to the Conference on work in the maritime sector since the last maritime session of the Conference.

Articles 27-28: (Admission of new Members) are not applicable.

Article 31 is not applicable.

Articles 48-54 (Governing Body elections) are not applicable.

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Now we turn to the next item on the agenda which concerns the fifth report of the Selection Committee (published in Provisional Record No. 5D).

If there are no objections I shall consider the report adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT CONCERNING THE SPECIAL SITTING OF THE CONFERENCE

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the arrangements concerning the special sitting this afternoon to study Appendix II to the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The list of speakers for this special sitting was closed on Tuesday, 8 June, at 6 p.m. so as to enable me, after consulting the Vice-President, to submit to the Conference for decision, without debate, a proposal for a time-limit on speeches.

The list contains the names of 51 speakers, of whom four are representatives of international non-governmental organizations. On the strength of this number, the Officers of the Conference propose fixing the maximum length of speeches at seven minutes, it being understood that this would be a maximum, and that the average length of speeches would be five to six minutes. To save time we shall invite speakers to be ready when it is their time to come up to the rostrum so that the speeches may follow each other without interruption. We would urge speakers to respect the time-limits set, in accordance with the Standing Orders. They should also abide by the democratic rules.

Of course there are exceptions, in particular for the European Communities, whose representative will be speaking on behalf of the 12 member governments, and for the Arab Maghreb Union, whose spokesman will be the representative of the Government of Tunisia. Since this contributes substantially to an overall reduction in the length of the debate and since this practice is followed in other organizations, it appears equitable to increase their time-limit to ten minutes.

Moreover, in order to ensure that the absolute deadline of 9 p.m. already fixed by the Conference is respected, the Officers of the Conference have also concluded that the President should periodically review the situation in the light of the number of speakers remaining on the list so that the maximum time allotted to each speaker can be recalculated if necessary.

If there is no objection to these arrangements which have to be decided by the Conference without debate, in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, I shall consider them adopted.

I would also like to inform the Conference of certain other arrangements concerning the special sitting and which fall within the prerogatives of the President and the Officers of the Conference.

The first concerns possible requests for the right of reply. In order to save time, this right of reply will be granted at the end of the sitting, in a global, but not in a cumulative manner. This means that the limit of two minutes which had been decided on at the beginning of the session for the exercise of the right of reply will not be multiplied by the number of statements to which the speaker requesting this right wishes to respond, it being understood that the President may, if time permits, allow this limit to be slightly exceeded if the reply concerns a large number of statements.

The second matter concerns non-governmental organizations, four of which have registered for this sitting, but which may in principle only speak with the authorization of all the Officers of the Conference. My colleagues and I have concluded that these non-governmental organizations will be authorized to speak only at the end of the sitting, in the order in which they are registered, and only if their interventions can take place before the Special Sitting concludes at 9 p.m.

May I, in conclusion, emphasize that these arrangements have been decided upon by the Officers of the Conference in the interests of consistency and objectivity and of respecting the legitimate interests of all the parties concerned. There have, moreover, been contacts with them. They are entirely in accordance with the spirit of consensus without which this Special Sitting could not take place. These arrangements should contribute, once again, to the success of an undertaking of whose importance everyone is aware. Now we have completed the presentation of the arrangements for the special sitting which is to be held this afternoon.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. LINARES CALVO (Government delegate, Cuba) – In the Report of the Director-General to this Conference, Social insurance and social protection, states that "societies which possess reasonable levels of democracy, which respect human rights and human dignity, which promote an equitable distribution of both income and wealth, and which gives thus the scope and opportunity to develop fully, are those which present the most fertile ground for the development of social protection". This is borne out by the experience of my country.

In Cuba, thanks to the revolution, we have a social security and social assistance schedule which protects the entire population. All workers, whether in urban industrialized areas or in agricultural rural areas, are entitled to a decent pension. In fact there is not a single worker or person who is not covered by our system of social security and social assistance.

There are, however, shortcomings in the socio-economic structures of many countries, including some of the more developed ones, and the inability to find valid answers in terms of justice and equity to the growing demands for social protection. This inability is more apparent where the neo-liberal theories, based on the monetarist, restrictive and privatizing approach of the adjustment programme recommended by the IMF further exacerbate imbalances as regards the distribution of income and wealth, swell the ranks of the poor, and plague society with unemployment, a lack of medical care, reduced educational opportunities and the absence of acceptable living conditions.

As a consequence of the application of the neo-liberal policy, some countries are starting to privatize social security, with the pretext that the State is unable to continue to fund social security, and that if it were to stop doing so, the fiscal situation would be entirely different. In short, in a region where a large number of countries are unable to provide protection for more than 20 per cent of the economically active population, it is claimed that social security is responsible for the economic crisis and should therefore be privatized. This is tantamount to destroying it, since by relinquishing the principle of solidarity on which it is based, one clears the way for private schemes under which each worker's pension is limited to what he or she contributed. Where does that leave those who were unable to find work, or those with low incomes? At the same time the employers are being relieved of the obligation to contribute to social security and the State's role in social policy is shrinking, as its functions are transferred to private enterprise and subjected to the laws of the market.

The consequences of this policy are reflected in the increasing poverty and social instability evident in a number of countries.

Social protection, from the point of view of both individual rights and rights of peoples and society as a whole, should have as its premise the recognition of the right to development, to dispose freely and without conditions of natural resources, and to establish structures and mechanisms for the distribution of wealth which are most appropriate for the purposes of social protection and consistent with the interests of the majority of the population.

Cuba, a developing country, has, for more than 30 years, been facing one of the biggest geopolitical challenges of our era. Thanks to the revolution and to socialism, we have proved time and again that it is possible to come to grips with social problems even in very difficult and adverse conditions.

Simultaneous attention to economic and social problems has been a deliberate, consistent and systematic policy in Cuba since 1959. This has enabled us to develop a comprehensive system of protection encompassing employment, public health, education, social security and social assistance.

Together with the radical socio-economic transformations which have taken place since the triumph of the revolution and which established the basis for a fairer and more equitable distribution of national income, one social policy has aimed at achieving full employment – a human right laid down in the Constitution and enjoyed daily by our citizens, in spite of the difficult economic conditions which we have to deal with.

At the present time, 1,250,000 persons, or 10 per cent of my country's population, are retired and receiving a pension.

In Cuba the State is responsible for all expenditures for social security services, public health and education; in 1992 these items represented 60 per cent of the State's budget.

As a result of the health policy in place since the triumph of the revolution, the health situation is similar to that of the developed countries: infant mortality is 10.2 per 1,000 live births; life expectancy stands at 75.7 years for both sexes; the mortality rate is 6.4 per thousand, and there are 7.3 hospital beds per 1,000 inhabitants.

National measures undertaken to enhance social protection must be complemented by major efforts at the international level, where the ILO plays a very active role, leading to collaboration with the countries of the so-called Third World. Such international action should take into consideration the following aspects, among others:

- It is necessary to undertake joint and concerted efforts to enable every country to develop its economy and settle its social debt, on the basis of the principle of fair distribution, ensuring that the poor will not become poorer and that the burden of adjustment will not fall on the most vulnerable social groups.
- Economic growth alone will not solve social problems. There must also be political will to use the benefits of growth in the interest of all, and for genuine economic and social development.
- We must broaden the scope of social security, not reduce it, by applying the principles of national solidarity, complete and universal coverage, efficiency, equity, redistribution and opportunity. These principles should be the basis of social policy, in accordance with various international agreements and events in this field, such as the recent Madrid agreement on social security in Ibero-America and at the Inter-American Conference on Social Security which was held in Acapulco, Mexico.

– Although it is clear that we must enhance efficiency in the administration and funding of the social security institutions, we must also ensure that we do not introduce machinery that is inconsistent with international standards. In particular, we must guard against approaches which rank economic viability and profit ahead of public interest.

Cuba, as you all know, is the victim of a most atrocious, prolonged and criminal economic blockade, which has continued for more than 30 years, and is increasing in intensity as a result of the so-called Torricelli Amendment. They want to starve us to death, by denying us access to markets; they want our sick to keep from regaining their health, by making it impossible for us to buy medication. This policy is shameful and criminal, and flies in the face of the international community's will, as expressed at the 47th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations in a resolution entitled "Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba".

But our people will survive any test, and holding our heads high we shall always remain independent and true, so that we may continue to live in dignity.

Mr. CASSAR (Ministry of Education and Human Resources, Malta) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to his high office. I also congratulate the Director-General on his reappointment. I thank the former members of the Governing Body and I wish success to the new members who were elected yesterday.

One of the features of the restructuring taking place in the world of work and employment today is the increasing demand for time flexibility by all parties concerned. Rapid shifts of consumer taste and market prices and product shifts cause company managements to have a more critical outlook on the allocation of time and work. Just-in-time production systems operating with near to zero inventory and stock levels must be accompanied by a just-in-time labour force to be fully effective, giving priority to the job and the client before the traditional ethos of institutionalized time-keeping. And even the employers are proving more positively disposed towards the adoption of flexitime arrangements, permitting greater discretion in organizing the balance between work and non-work duties and activities.

No wonder therefore, that there are very many departures today from fixed-time, nine-to-five working arrangements, or ten-to-six arrangements as we have here. Part-time work, along with other ingenious adaptations of time flexibility, have become the order of the day. The demise of mass standard labour-intensive manufacturing has made the concept of fixed time at work not only possibly redundant but also counter-productive to business, employer, manager and worker alike. The now popular human resource management philosophy is of the same opinion: "Do your job and do it well; first, plan your time accordingly" is the dictum, enshrined as it is in a belief in and dependence on the total resource endowment of labour, including time allocation. The old school would have it differently. Concerned as it was primarily with control and quantity, rather than commitment and quality, the pattern was "keep time first – everything else follows".

The proposed conclusions for the adoption of standards on part-time work in the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation deserves wholehearted support. It is certainly a step calculated to better guarantee justice to an increasingly large category of workers. But it can also be regarded as a step towards the even more important recognition of the need for better account to be taken of the relationship between the formal and the informal (inclusive of, but more extensive than the "black") sectors of the economy. An appeal in this sense was made to this Conference by the Government of Malta a few years ago.

It has often been recognized that part-time work straddles both the formal and the informal sectors of the economy. Many kinds of work, including personal services, handiwork, maintenance and gardening jobs, are generally available only through part-timers in the informal sector. Other kinds of work, for example work in the big retailing stores, are usually allocated on a regular part-time basis. Most of these part-time jobs are taken up in the developed and increasingly in developing countries by women who for the rest of their time contribute to economic growth additionally through the informal economy. This kind of double participation in the world of work is becoming increasingly significant through the penetration of communication high technology into the home. Clearly, the proposals at present before us are not intended to be a total approach to this really major aspect of the changing situation of the world of work. But they are a step in the right direction. They provide at least an indication of new perspectives that require urgent attention.

There is one point which I feel would be an important improvement in the text. Point 12 proposes that – and here I quote: "measures should be taken to encourage the creation of part-time jobs and to facilitate access to such jobs". The three measures proposed are, in my opinion, good but I think that, in addition to adapting social security measures so that they do not discourage acceptance of part-time work, a reference should also be included to taxation. There are several cases, notoriously that of market gardeners and fruit farmers, for whom the engagement of part-time labour is essential, where the tax system effectively can make it impossible. This is undoubtedly a major inducement to "black" economic activity, and reasonable adjustments of the taxation system complementary to those envisaged for the social security system would lead to its return to the fold of legitimacy. It would also make realistic the provision in section 7 regarding the right of part-timers to organize themselves in unions and to bargain collectively.

Of course, the adaptation of social security provisions, in order to encourage both the expansion of home-and neighbourhood-based work for the middle-aged and the elderly as well as flexible or early retirement schemes which are considered desirable in many contexts, is essential for the encouragement of part-time work by such pensioners. Earlier retirement will be either too expensive to fund or impose unacceptably low levels of income unless real opportunities for suitable part-time work are created.

It is obvious that both in a Convention for widespread international application, and also in Recommendations, it is impossible to be very concrete or to spell out practical options in detail. But it is important to recognize that measures concerning part-time work should not be considered merely as refinements of existing patterns of legislation to polish up social justice provisions, but should reflect the important shifts occurring in the structure of the world of work as well as a better perception of previously neglected realities, such as the size and role of the informal economy.

The changes at present occurring in the means and modes of production force us to anticipate that in the near future many more men and women will need to be able to transfer more easily and cyclically from the formal to the informal economies, and indeed probably to work part time for significant periods of their life. It is consequently of the greatest importance that the proposed Convention and Recommendation be seen as signalling a call for a change in outlook, not only by governments but also by private sector employers and trade unions. It should perhaps be seen as a first step towards the promotion of what has been called "integrated resource management".

As Graeme Shankland wrote in his book Wanted work: "At the moment full-time employees have access to resources in their firms, often underused, but do not own them and have little time to exploit them. The unemployed pensioners and others in the informal economy have skills and spare time but are denied access to resources; small businesses can recruit and keep their workers but enjoy limited access to resources; large ones can command vast resources but find it difficult to recruit workers. Bringing together time and labour with resources and permitting both to work can only benefit individuals, the local community and the general level of social and economic activity."

I would like to conclude by further urging that the allusion to publicity and information concerning part-time work in paragraph (c) of Point 12 be expanded to cover also publicity and information about the positive aspects of part-time work in the present crucial juncture of the world economy. Its encouragement will not result merely from governmental edicts. The setting out of standards through legislation and regulation is to be negotiated on certain given points. But the consensus of employers and unions in a common and shared understanding of the new role of part-time work is equally essential, particularly of its complementarity to full-time work. It is most important that the two types of work be no longer regarded as rivals but as both necessary for the better development of all. I suspect that there is still much scope for intensive and extensive public education on this score and that the International Labour Organization can and should contribute a great deal to that end. A steady amelioration leading to a condition of indefinite contract even for part-time wage-earners will substantially reduce the exploitation, conscious or otherwise, of this labour segment and further intensify participation for the benefit of all concerned.

Original Burmese: Mr. THAUNG (Minister for Labour, Myanmar) It is indeed my profound pleasure and honour to address the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. This Conference also provides me with an opportunity to meet with tripartite delegates from member countries gathered at this august assembly with common objectives.

On behalf of the Myanmar delegation and in my own name, may I extend warmest congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to his high office. I am fully confident that with his rich experience, ingenuity and wisdom this session will yield fruitful results.

I would first of all like to express our delegation's full support to the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the Organization. In particular, allow me to make some brief comments on the important item on the agenda concerning the role of ILO in technical cooperation. Technical cooperation has been a major concern of the Organization for many years. We believe that the measures envisaged in the Report can truly bring both short-term and long-term benefits for the developing countries. We wholeheartedly welcome the new approaches and proposals relating to the role of the ILO in the area of technical cooperation.

The delegation of Myanmar would like to stress that the fruits of technical cooperation programmes should be fully enjoyed by its recipients. In this regard, the ILO should continue to exert its efforts to meet the needs of the respective region and the needs of the individual country as well. Moreover, we are of the view that member countries should strive harder to achieve closer cooperation at the regional level for the realization of social goals.

The Union of Myanmar became a Member of the ILO in 1948. Throughout these 45 years of membership, she has firmly stood by the fundamental principles of the Organization and has faithfully carried out its programmes. Myanmar has full confidence in the ILO and has always supported its noble endeavours. Myanmar has been participating actively in other international bodies in accordance with her independent and active foreign policy. Myanmar will continue to enhance her cooperation among the family of nations based on sincerity and good will as she has done in the past.

The State Law and Order Restoration Council is fully committed to uplifting the standard of the workers in the Union of Myanmar and all efforts are being made with a view to achieving this goal. May I be permitted at this juncture to inform the assembly that, despite these noble efforts by the Government, anti-government terrorist insurgents are trying to propagate unfounded and malicious propaganda to create misunderstandings and tarnish the good reputation of the country internationally.

Some of the terrorist insurgents are expatriates who have violated the existing laws of the land and have formed illegal organizations to engage in activities against the Government. In matters concerning the workers, a sham organization which does not represent a single member of the workforce of Myanmar has been formed by these expatriates with the political motivation of propagating groundless allegations against Myanmar.

I have stated this to provide true information to the distinguished delegates who are gathered before this august assembly so that the matters concerning my country can be viewed and considered in their true perspective.

The present-day Myanmar is witnessing progress and development in all aspects, in keeping with the changing times. In the political sphere, the National Convention has been convened since 9 January 1993 to lay down basic principles for drafting a new, firm and an enduring state Constitution. The delegates to the National Convention include not only representatives from political parties and representatives elected at the general election, but also representatives from national races and people from all strata of life, including workers, peasants and the intelligentsia.

In this national exercise we have stressed the importance of avoiding the weakness and flaws of the previous Constitutions. As the saying goes, "A good beginning can ensure a safe future". We believe that the adoption of the basic principles of the new state Constitution should be made with great care and thoroughness as it constitutes the lifeblood of our nation. The National Convention is being held with a view to the perpetuation of the Union, and to secure a peaceful and tranquil environment for all the national races. The entire nation is therefore eagerly awaiting the success of the National Convention. The emergence of a new state Constitution will result in the formation of a strong Government and the establishment of political, economic and social structures in conformity with the provisions of the state Constitution.

Economic development is vital for increasing the living standards of workers and peasants. In Myanmar, 1992-93 has been designated as an economic year and endeavours are being made to achieve all-round development. The use of innovative methods has greatly contributed to success in agriculture and the fishery and livestock-breeding sectors. Rice cultivation, fish breeding, the cultivation of all-year-round crops in all regions, multiple cropping, the reclaiming of virgin and fallow lands have met with in unprecedented success. This in turn has given rise to a substantial increase in income.

Much has been done in the social sphere for the well-being of employees in the public sector. The delegation of Myanmar already had informed last year's assembly of the establishment of new satellite towns providing for the proper housing and settlement of more than 50,000 employees.

Another encouraging move for public service employees is the substantial increase of their salary and wage rates by 25 to 33 per cent in order to narrow down the disparity between income and soaring commodity prices. This increase is the second of its kind which covers both in-service and retired personnel. In addition, due to the relaxation of taxes by the Government on this increase, employees can fully enjoy the benefit of the boost to their salaries and wages. In this manner, the Government has been striving for the well-being of the workers, peasants and the entire population.

Myanmar is achieving unprecedented success in her national development endeavours. Moreover, due to the prevalence of stability, peace and tranquillity throughout the nation, people can freely pursue their economic, social and religious activities. The malicious propaganda against the Union of Myanmar will automatically disappear.

Before concluding, I would like to state that Myanmar will continue to participate and cooperate in the activities of the Organization as a nation where universal values of justice, liberty and equality flourish, and as a nation which protects the rights and privileges of all national races and citizens, including those of the workers, peasants and the intelligentsia.

Original French: Mr. TRENTCHEV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – I should like to associate myself with the preceding speakers' expressions of respect with regard to the important function to which the President has been elected.

During the past few years we have been witnessing changes of a political and economic character unknown until now. Movements towards political freedom are, almost everywhere, proceeding together with economic reforms.

The pluralism which exists in our country and the principle of rotation applied to the participation of different trade union organizations in the activities of your Organization have rendered possible my presence at this session of the International Labour Conference as representative of the Podkrepa Labour Confederation. Our organization was born out of the struggle against totalitarianism and for trade union freedom and all its efforts are oriented towards uniting its members on the path to democracy. These are the objectives of our current policy.

The end of the Cold War between the most powerful countries in the world brought new challenges to society worldwide – poverty, unemployment, new sources of bloody struggles.

In this complex situation, the relative part played by the ILO with regard to all these new problems is very considerable. The nature and content of the list of themes included in the agenda reflect the different aspects of integrated social defence.

The problems of social insurance and social protection, the prevention of serious work accidents, part-time work, as well as the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, are very topical for our country.

As far as Bulgaria is concerned, we are not afraid to affirm that the country has opted for tripartite cooperation which has found favourable conditions for further development. With this purpose in view, we can tap the rich experience of many member countries of the ILO. We are convinced that in the future this cooperation will develop at all levels with, of course, the precious assistance of your Organization. Tripartite cooperation is a powerful arm when it comes to aiding countries, such as those of Central and Eastern Europe and other countries of the developing world, passing through an economic crisis. We consider that mutual aid at the national level and international level is a means for strengthening the economy of poorer countries, and we therefore appeal to our social partners in the developed countries – to the employers – to help the employers of countries undergoing crisis in their efforts to create new jobs so as to tap unutilized economic and agricultural resources and to achieve a reasonable price-fixing policy for raw materials and imports. We launch an appeal for a sincere and systematic dialogue.

The world is witnessing dangerous explosions which have become social and national conflicts. It is possible to prevent them by means of a joint effort by the international organizations, by governments, by our social partners. The virtues which have been proclaimed by all religions without exception should not exist only on the pages of holy books. There should be a place for them in our everyday life.

I should like to inform the present assembly that I respect deeply the fact that Bulgaria is one of a certain number of countries which have been placed in an extremely unfavourable economic situation for rather unfortunate geographical and historical reasons. Its support of democratic forces fighting against the occupation of Kuwait resulted in a burden of a debt of 2 billion United States dollars. Debts additional to this amount have been forecast in connection with the economic measures taken by the United Nations enterprises in connection with former Yugoslavia. The communist regime imposed upon our people at the end of the Second World War left a heritage of a tens of billions of dollars debit as well as a ruined industrial and agricultural economy. All this, of course, at the cost of the workers, the employees and the peasants. We, the trade unions, as their legitimate defenders, are obliged to launch an appeal from this platform to the participants in this forum to assist us to achieve financial stability by the creation of new jobs and the abolition of poverty.

We launch an appeal to the ILO for active cooperation with those who have the power to solve problems at the level of the world economy. These are the International Monetary Fund, the European Community and the economically developed countries. We hope that they will assist us in overcoming unemployment and poverty. It is the only way to achieve the elimination of social tension and bloody conflict.

Our members and our sympathizers have followed with great interest the numerous instances of technical cooperation between the ILO and Bulgaria, which they have found to be very appropriate. The new team in Budapest in this connection is a very valuable unit for the activities of the ILO in our country.

As Vice-Chairman of the ICFTU, I should like to express the wish to all participants in the current session that this meeting should become an important stage in the working out of an international and national tripartite cooperation strategy in the struggle for freedom, the basis of which is the struggle against unemployment and poverty.

Ms. WIDDECOMBE (Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – I should first like to congratulate the President on his appointment to chair the proceedings of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and indeed to pay tribute to the experience and commitment which qualifies him for this important role.

I warmly welcome the opportunity to address this Conference today on the topics of social insurance and social protection. I congratulate the Director-General for choosing these topics for consideration at the Conference this year: they are both of considerable concern to many countries at the present time. I propose to comment briefly on the Director-General's Report and then to describe the approach of the United Kingdom Government.

The Director-General's Report paints a daunting picture of the current situation. On the one hand it chronicles the development since 1945 of an increasingly ambitious framework of ILO Recommendations and Conventions to lay down standards for state provision of social security. On the other hand the Report indicates that it has taken several decades even for highly industrialized countries to achieve comprehensive social security systems and that the funding of these systems now threatens to impose an unsustainable burden of additional costs. In the meantime there seems little prospect of developing countries ever establishing comparable systems of social security without very substantial growth in employment. The Report also concedes that few of the relevant ILO Conventions have been ratified even by a significant number of industrialized countries.

The United Kingdom Government believes that this very comprehensive analysis poses serious questions about the best way forward both for industrialized and for developing countries and about the relevance for developing countries of ILO standards in this field.

In the United Kingdom we have one of the world's oldest and most developed social security systems, a comprehensive state-administered benefit scheme which covers the entire population. It is provided through a contributory social insurance scheme complemented by a range of non-contributory measures.

Under our national insurance scheme, benefits for sickness, unemployment and old age are provided entirely from contributions and currently account for almost exactly half of the total benefit expenditure in the United Kingdom.

The contributory principle is well established, but the United Kingdom Government sees no reason why people should be restricted to just one means of providing for themselves and their families. We believe in increasing personal choice and have therefore opened up the possibility of individuals receiving part of their pension entitlement through a personal pension scheme of their own choice rather than entirely through the state system. This encourages self-reliance and, with other changes to the scheme, has also helped to reduce the likely burden on future contributors.

At the same time we recognize of course that the contributory principle cannot provide security for those who are not working or who have been unable to build up an entitlement to social insurance. We therefore also have a well-developed system of non-contributory social protection, which is funded from general taxation. This system offers greater flexibility in meeting needs than is possible with a purely insurance-based approach, which requires the prediction of future contingencies before they can be covered. But the cost of funding both our national insurance scheme and our non-contributory benefits has been rising at an alarming rate. In the past year spending on social security was more than twice what we spent on health, and more than ten times what we spent on education.

One cause of the rising trend in social security expenditure has been unemployment. Like many countries we have had to spend more on unemployment benefits. But we are also spending more on families, more on the sick, more on disabled people and much more on the elderly. Quite simply there are more elderly people and they are living longer than in the past. In 1990 there were 3.4 people of working age in the United Kingdom for every one pensioner. But by 2030 that will have declined to only 2.2 people of working age in the United Kingdom for every pensioner. The burden on the working population of supporting expenditure on pensions will therefore continue to rise, all other things being equal.

The key question therefore is whether we can allow social security to take a bigger and bigger share of government spending. If it continues to grow faster than public expenditure and the economy, then it can only be funded by an increased burden of taxes and contributions on individuals and business or by cuts in other programmes, such as education and health, which few would welcome.

So the United Kingdom is adopting policies designed both to contain pressure on costs and to use finite resources to best effect.

Firstly, we have significantly reduced the running costs of our social security scheme. Secondly, we have changed state pension rules to enable individuals to provide for part of their pension outside the state scheme as I explained earlier. And thirdly, we have used non-contributory benefits and targeted them on particular client groups to help focus resources on those in greatest need. Fourthly, we are designing social security policies to achieve a balance between providing for needs and ensuring that incentives to work are maintained and indeed improved, and any financial disincentives minimized. An example is "in-work" benefits for families or the disabled with low wages, where entitlement is gradually withdrawn as wages increase, thus gradually preparing individuals to support themselves.

All these measures make a useful contribution to containing the costs of social security. But social security policies cannot succeed on their own. As the Report acknowledges they depend for their success on the wealth generated by growth in the economy and employment. In this context, I would like to stress the importance of the right macroeconomic policies which create the conditions for economic growth, particularly by holding down inflation, and the need to relieve employers of unnecessary regulation particularly because this helps to encourage individuals to create their own employment and it encourages small businesses to expand.

Whether in the context of the ILO, or for the United Kingdom in the context of the European Community, it is vitally important that new burdens are not placed on the shoulders of employers without proper account being taken of the implications those burdens may have for competitiveness and therefore for jobs. It is almost always the case that whenever new forms of social protection or new social security safeguards for workers are proposed, those putting them forward do so out of a genuine concern to improve the conditions of those who work. The ILO has a proud tradition in this respect. But particularly in countries where basic standards are already in place and enforced, we need to be extremely careful that in adding to them, we do not undermine the very jobs that we are trying to protect.

And so I suggest that both at the national and the international level we must continue to search for imaginative solutions which will allow us to continue to provide support for those in need while increasing their incentives and their capacities to become self-sufficient, without placing an unbearable burden on employers, on the present economy or indeed on future generations of contributors. I commend the ILO's efforts to find fresh solutions to the complex problems involved in this task both through the debate at this Conference and through its technical cooperation programmes.

In that context I am delighted to say that the United Kingdom has been able to play a role itself in helping the ILO provide technical assistance to other countries in this field. I feel sure that sharing experience between countries can offer practical solutions to the difficult problems which we all face in the social security field and in other areas of common concern within the ILO's mandate. It therefore seems particularly appropriate that the ILO's whole approach to technical cooperation is being examined at the Conference this year. The United Kingdom Government believes that it is important for the ILO to ensure that its own objectives and procedures keep pace with the changing requirements of the modern world, and that in particular its technical cooperation is targeted cost-effectively where it is most needed and where the ILO is best qualified to help. We recognize that far-reaching reforms are already under way. The United Kingdom Government will strongly support a continuing programme of reform to introduce those further improvements still necessary to equip the ILO to discharge its role effectively into the twenty-first century.

Mr. MOUSHIOUTAS (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – Mr. President, in congratulating you on your election to the presidency of this Conference, the Delegation of Cyprus feels that the Conference is in excellent hands. We are confident that through your leadership and qualities, this Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

The theme chosen by the Director-General for this year's Conference is indeed very topical and of great concern to many developing countries as well as a significant number of developed ones. The Director-General is to be warmly congratulated on his Report, which highlights some of the strategic issues which governments, the social partners and social security agencies must address if social protection is to have greater meaning for a wider section of the population.

Although we understand the factors which have led to the great disparity between developed and developing countries in their ability to protect the disadvantaged, we cannot but feel greatly concerned at the existence of this disparity and we fully endorse fully the strategies put forward by the Director-General for pushing back or mitigating the constraints which prevent developing countries from enhancing their social protection.

We could not agree more with the Director-General that "social protection involves the willingness of each individual in a community to contribute to the care of its members who are disadvantaged or need support in the knowledge, of course, that he or she will receive similar support if and when it is needed". Convincing the average person of the value of solidarity as a prerequisite for the development of social protection is not an easy task. Having realized the role which workers' and employers' organizations could play in fostering a belief in solidarity among their members, we have since from the early days of our independence enlisted the support and active involvement of our social partners in policy formulation and decision-making on all labour and social security matters.

Indeed, we believe that our achievements in the field of social protection, which compare well with those in developed countries, can be attributed largely to the involvement and commitment of the social partners. At this point, I would like to talk briefly about the evolution of social security in Cyprus and to share with you our experience.

The earliest attempts to provide social security in my country can be traced back to the fifteenth century B.C. and specifically to the contract signed at around that time by Stasikypros, king of the ancient city-kingdom of Idalion, and the doctor Onisillos. On the basis of that contact, the latter undertook to offer medical care at the city's expense to victims of the Persian siege of the city.

Much later on, the care of the old and the disabled became the responsibility of the Church or depended on the charitable feelings of the citizens. This state of affairs continued until 1957, when the colonial government introduced the first social insurance scheme, which provided limited coverage both with regards to personal and the material scope.

Since the establishment in 1960 of the independent Republic of Cyprus, in 1960, the Constitution of which expressly guarantees the right of every citizen to social security, the extension and improvement of social security have been basic objectives of the Government's social policy. In line with this policy, the scheme was gradually extended to cover all employees and the self-employed, whilst improvements in the form of increased and new benefits continued to be made until 1974.

The tragic events of that year and their adverse repercussions on the economy of the island as a whole threatened the viability of the scheme.

To save it from bankruptcy and to safeguard social security as an institution, the Government, with the consent of its social partners, was compelled to reduce benefits substantially and to suspend the payment of unemployment benefit. At the same time, it passed legislation to a national assistance scheme as a safety net providing statutory benefits subject to a means test.

The slow but steady recovery of the economy allowed gradual restoration of the scheme to pre-1974 levels and made possible some further improvements.

However, despite all the improvements, the protection afforded by the scheme was inadequate mainly because of the single-rate nature of contributions and benefits. This shortcoming, and the desperate need of the working population of Cyprus for more effective protection, gave a spur to the establishment of non-statutory occupational schemes. These schemes generally took the form of provident funds covering the employees of a particular firm or enterprise. In essence, they were saving schemes characterized by an individualistic approach and without any element of solidarity or income redistribution.

In cooperation with its social partners, the Government of Cyprus reviewed the whole situation. The review resulted in the introduction, from October 1980, of an earnings-related scheme financed by contributions from the State, employers and employees, which guaranteed a decent level of benefits.

Among the principles on which this new scheme was based were those of solidarity and the redistribution of income. In keeping with those principles, there were no exemptions from the scheme even for categories of employees such as civil servants, whose occupational schemes provided better protection. At the same time, and in order to ease the burden on the economy entailed by the introduction of the new scheme and to avoid the creation of over privileged groups among the working population, provision was made to reduce benefits from the occupational schemes with due regard to the value of the additional benefits payable under the new scheme. In 1988, family benefits financed from general taxation were also introduced.

This synopsis of the evolution of social security in Cyprus shows that its development has followed a gradual but steady and progressive path. We do not claim, however, that there is no room for further improvements. We are currently considering, inter alia, the introduction of a universal non-contributory old-age pension, the elimination of existing inequalities between the sexes in social security legislation and the provision of additional benefits to people in a state of dependency.

The Director-General has proclaimed ILO's willingness to offer to its member States both normative and technical support in matters concerning the structure and development of their social security schemes and social protection. Having itself benefited from ILO assistance in setting up and fostering its social security system, the Government of Cyprus would like to take this opportunity of assuring the ILO of its own willingness to share this experience with other countries which may find it useful.

My Ministry, through its Department of Social Insurance, will be glad to collaborate with the ILO in helping developing countries, including those of Central and Eastern Europe, to reform their social insurance institutions. In this connection, I would like to mention that in cooperation with the ILO, we shall be hosting a round table meeting early next year on tripartism and the administration of social security, with the participation of high-level tripartite delegations from those countries.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the Director-General once again on his excellent Report which has given much food for thought to all concerned with social security, and to stress that there are no ready-made solutions to social security issues. Each country must consider its social and economic conditions and the aspirations of its people and formulate solutions accordingly, drawing on the experience of other countries and guided by the principles of the international instruments.

Original German: Mr. TEGTMEIER (Secretary of State, Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, Germany) – I should first like to congratulate the President on being entrusted by this session of the Conference with the responsibility of his high office. I trust that under his leadership the proceedings will be both productive and successful. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his re-election two weeks ago for the period 1994-99. He may rest assured that we shall make every effort to support and keep abreast of his activities while in office.

The central theme of the Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference is Social insurance and social protection. A more topical theme is scarcely conceivable in view of the major economic changes and changes in social structures under way in many countries and of the consequences of the weak economic situation worldwide. I say this as the representative of a country regarded as the originator of the centrepiece of social insurance – old-age insurance. Germany was the first country to introduce an old-age pension scheme in 1889, followed by Denmark in 1891, New Zealand in 1898, the United Kingdom in 1908 and France in 1912.

Far be it for me, however, to deduce from Germany's pioneering role in social insurance that the German system should stand as a model for others or be taken over by them lock, stock and barrel. Even Denmark's second oldest model differs markedly from ours. Both systems, and many others too, as may be gathered from the Report of the Director-General, have proved their worth but have required constant improvement and will continue to do so in the future.

All schemes have one underlying principle in common: men or women who have provided through their work not only for their own well-being and that of their families but also for the economic well-being of the community must not be allowed to sink into poverty when age, sickness, unemployment or motherhood prevents them from working.

As noted in the Report of the Director-General, social security and social protection schemes are facing major challenges today throughout the world. Three separate situations may be distinguished:

- The advanced schemes in many industrialized countries are becoming almost impossible to finance because of population factors and economic recession – with its implications for the labour market.
- In most developing countries, social security schemes – in many cases based on those established by former colonial Powers – cover only a small proportion of the working population and provide only a narrow range of benefits; there is no comprehensive protection for unemployment due to illness, old age, childbearing or disability. There are also frequent administrative difficulties in respect of collection of contributions, payment of benefits and calculation of entitlements.
- In the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, in transition from a centrally planned to a market economy, the modest enterprise-linked welfare systems collapsed in many cases together with unproductive companies; the State, the Party, the State enterprise and the State-run union that were responsible for allocating jobs, fixing wages and providing social benefits have ceased to perform these tasks and have not been replaced by alternative social security authorities.

The Director-General has no panacea to offer for these problems. There is no such solution. And I have no cure to offer either. If I had, I could put it to good use in my own country.

Allow me, however, to offer some constructive criticism regarding the Report. I refer not so much to the fact that the Report does not always make it clear that there are countries – including Germany – in which different forms of benefit – social assistance and statutory old-age insurance – are available to ensure a minimum income and to provide old-age benefit consistent with a person's previous working life. Given the brevity of the overview, which makes it easier to grasp, this omission is excusable although it may be misleading for a reader who is not familiar with the material.

On the other hand, I missed a reference to the connection with social protection and population factors. Although the impact of population trends on pension funding is described, there is no mention of the unquestionable influence on people's reproductive behaviour of the introduction and development of social protection schemes. I shall give two examples from a recently published scientific paper: the birth ratio in Germany in 1880 (before the introduction of old-age insurance) was 38 births per 1,000 members of the population (slightly fewer than in Nicaragua and Bangladesh at present); the corresponding ratio today is well under ten births. In Cuba the annual population growth rate was 2.4 per cent before old-age insurance was introduced there in the early 1960s; 25 years later the growth rate had fallen to 1.2 per cent.

The conclusion to be drawn from these figures is that high population growth rates often reflect anxiety about being left without an income in later life. Children assume the function of a social insurance. The fact that the rearing of large families overtaxes the parents' energies is usually realized too late.

As a result, instead of caring for retired parents as grown-up skilled and productive workers, children have to contribute to the family budget at an early age because their parents' wages are insufficient. This is one of the reasons for the phenomenon of child labour, against which the ILO has declared war with firm support from Germany.

But to return to the Report of the Director-General, it leaves one with the impression that the ILO is well placed to play a role in overcoming the present crises and shortcomings in social security schemes.

To come back to the three situations already referred to: in the case of the industrialized countries, whose social security schemes are in crisis, the ILO's role will basically consist solely in serving as a forum for the sharing of experience and in supporting and stimulating such exchanges by means of scientific studies and meetings.

In the case of the developing countries, however, and also in the case of States whose economies are undergoing a process of transition, the ILO can do more than merely promote exchanges of experience. The experience it has gained from evaluating different social security schemes, and the expertise of its specialists in that area, allow it to offer valuable advice and practical assistance to countries in which a system of social security and social protection is only now being introduced or reorganized.

In section 3 of the Report we find the basic elements needed for the gradual establishment of solid social security schemes – with a reminder that this cannot be achieved overnight.

Of course, funds are required for ILO assistance of this kind but I have the impression that social security has hitherto been the Cinderella of development aid.

As far as bilateral German development assistance is concerned, I am not alone in harbouring such feelings. In March 1993 the representatives of the two ruling parties in the German Federal Parliament, the CDU/CSU and the FDP, presented a report on the subject "The development and extension of social security systems in the developing countries".

The report begins with the following sentences: "Social security has hitherto played a secondary role in cooperation for development. Although the fight against poverty and its causes has now become a central component of development policy worldwide, the number of poor people is still increasing. The reasons are not only civil wars, natural disasters, economic decline and the population explosion but also the collapse of traditional security systems."

The report also makes the following recommendation to the Federal Government: "To report within six months on existing projects and past experience in introducing and developing national, multilateral and non-State social security schemes. The report should also assess the strategies of the International Labour Organization and its experience in setting up social security schemes."

But even the ILO devotes scant attention to social security in channelling funds into development assistance: it comes only eleventh among the 15 major programmes in the draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95.

As regards Germany's cooperation with the ILO, it strikes me that none of the projects that we promoted in the last few years dealt with social security (one such project is now planned for 1994). The Federal Government is less to blame for this than the ILO, which submits the project proposals.

Our conclusion is that there is a great deal of catching up to do in the field of social security. This has also been recognized by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund which, as the latter's Director-General Mr. Camdessus noted here two years ago, is laying special emphasis on the promotion of social security in its projects. The Report of the Director-General should, to my mind, become the starting-point for a rethinking exercise and for new attitudes and projects. Let us seize the opportunity we have been offered.

Original Spanish: Mr. HERRERA ROA (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – It is a great honour for me to participate in this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the employers of the Dominican Republic.

Before saying a few words about the items on the agenda of this session, I would like to express my well deserved congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO for his important Report which not only reviews the activities of the ILO over the past year, but tackles one of the subjects of most concern today to people in the labour world, namely social insurance and social protection.

The first Part of the Report deals with the question of social security schemes and social protection in member States, and the role which can be played by the ILO in helping to make these schemes more efficient.

According to the Report of the Director-General, many countries plan to introduce radical reforms in their social security and social protection systems. This is a necessity, the Director-General says, brought about by various factors. First, the precarious economic circumstances prevailing at present, particularly in developing countries. Secondly, the application of economic stabilization and structural adjustment programmes. Thirdly, the inefficiency which in some countries besets the management, administration and running of the social security institutions.

None of these factors is foreign to the social reality of the Dominican Republic. One of our priorities in the employers' sector is the establishment of a social security system which, we believe, should be based on solidarity, administrative efficiency, technical and financial efficiency and the granting of free choice to its members. The most representative employers' organizations of the Dominican Republic are, together with the labour sector and the competent official institutions in the health field, working together to create a major national tripartite forum for social security which will meet on 6 July of this year.

We have in our country a private social security scheme which emerged as a result of the inefficiency of our social security system. This scheme, which is based on agreements between physician and patient establishing agreed annual fees has been favourably received by the public and the number of participants has been estimated at between 500,000 and 800,000. This is almost double the number of persons covered by the state social security system. We do not intend to substitute or privatize state social security, but in the light of what is likely to happen in the field of social and medical services, the objective is to give this private scheme an important part to play in the reform of our national health system. The social security system, once it has been restructured, should not be totally privatized nor totally state-run. It should be a combination of the two. Therefore, the idea is that through a basic health plan people will have a free choice of public social security hospitals or private clinics. We believe that the universalization of a health social protection system as I have just described will lead to greater efficiency, equity and solidarity.

As regards the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations as regards the Dominican Republic, we would like to express our satisfaction with its comments and observations, which are a recognition of the efforts of the social partners in the Dominican Republic in achieving true tripartite dialogue which has resulted in the adoption of our new Labour Code. The Committee of Experts duly noted with satisfaction the adoption of a Labour Code on 29 May 1992, which prohibits work by minors and persons under the age of 14 in the agricultural sector. The Committee also noted with satisfaction the provisions of the new Labour Code as regards trade union freedoms, which modify and derogate several standards which had been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts for a number of years. The new Labour Code includes in its scope agricultural and related workers as well as workers in state enterprises and autonomous state bodies of a commercial, industrial and financial kind. The Committee also noted with satisfaction basic principle No. 7 of the Code which expressly prohibits discrimination, and incorporates the text of each of the forms of discrimination set forth in Article 1 of Convention No. 111.

The employers' sector in the Dominican Republic is making efforts to ensure that the new institutions established under the new Labour Code are truly effective and achieve the purpose for which they were designed. This is the case with the members of the labour tribunals, a new institution in our labour legislation.

The employers' groups are concerned about ensuring that adequate training is provided for the members who will represent the employers. Courses and seminars are being organized to ensure that we train people and thus contribute to greater justice. They are being paid for their services, as laid down in the new Labour Code, and the employers' sector is trying to ensure a permanent office is established to provide assistance and follow-up services to these members.

As regards the labour credit guarantees, the employers' organizations in my country are working towards and preparing for the implementation of regulations for these guarantees, as required under section 738 of the new Labour Code, on a tripartite basis of consensus between the State, employers and workers.

I do not wish to conclude my comments without referring to one of the items included by the Governing Body on the agenda of this Session. I am referring to item 5 concerning part-time work. Part-time work can constitute a very attractive and practical opportunity for both enterprises and workers. As indicated in the report prepared by the Office, it is a form of employment which could be developed where the labour market is suffering the effects of the recession, bearing in mind the possibilities offered for the creation of jobs, and reduction of unemployment and the mechanisms of access or return to the labour market.

My country has already adopted legislation in this respect. Section 9 of our new Labour Code states that a worker may work for one or more employer on different work schedules. This provision has been included in our new legislation to help remedy the need for higher levels of income and facilitate the use of part-time work which is one of the remedies to combat unemployment.

Ms. SIMPSON (Minister of Labour, Welfare and Sport, Jamaica) – On behalf of the Jamaican delegation, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this sensitive and responsible post. May I also wish him every success in guiding the deliberations of this important Conference.

Since 1919, this Organization has established itself as a key international actor on social policy and development issues aimed at improving living conditions and standards worldwide.

It is this record of consistency and demonstrated capacity to lead and perform that reinforces our expectations of positive outcomes from this Conference.

We therefore welcome and thank the Director-General for an excellent Report focused on Social insurance and social protection. No subject could be more relevant and more timely, nor more compelling in its implications for millions across the globe, nor more in urgent need of collective discussion and practical responses.

We confront this agenda of issues on social protection programmes precisely at a time when many countries face a deterioration in their economic situation.

Many social protection systems worldwide are now in need of restructuring and modernization. Traditional frameworks once used to articulate and manage social protection portfolios must be redesigned. New concepts and approaches, particularly as they relate to the management of social protection matters, must be put into practice.

Beyond these deficiencies, there are well-known structural obstacles confronting poor States wishing to build viable social protection systems. Social conditioning and popular opinion has led to the dependence on the State as the main agent of social protection. Contemporary thinking suggests a revision of that approach. Policy leaders and clients alike must now learn quickly to adjust to the new reality.

Developing States also experience the inconvenient combination of weak economies, slow economic growth, persistent poverty and chronic vulnerability to a range of possible adversities. In such circumstances only a rudimentary social protection portfolio can emerge. Moreover, existing social protection schemes are normally financed by contributions from wage-earners in the formal sectors of the economy and from taxation revenue. These circumstances guarantee only a small, narrow social security portfolio.

Many developing countries are also experiencing fundamental changes in their economic structure as result of structural adjustment. In the majority of cases these adjustment programmes bring with them varying levels of social distress. They have lowered standards of living. They have heightened levels of insecurity, and for some States, they have certainly meant political and social instability. This kind of environment does not readily attract foreign and local investment.

Several developing countries also underestimate the management resources needed for the administration of their social protection schemes. In consequence, there is waste and inefficiency, client neglect and insufficient concentration on human resource development. Additionally, the quality and quantity of public education and social protection often lag behind desirable levels in most developing countries. The relevant sectors in society are thus insufficiently prepared for activities of self-help or claim-making, and they adjust poorly to new thinking and practices in social protection.

These are merely a few of the well-known structural conditions that surround efforts in the Third World to provide social protection systems. But we must move from problems to responses. Broadly speaking, Jamaica has been trying to respond to the imperatives of social protection by way of the combined use of some basic strategies.

In the first place, we rely on the usual public policy tools to design and manage a range of poverty alleviation activities, particularly for the most vulnerable groups in society. These range from poor relief schemes, feeding programmes, national insurance, financial support and private pension funds to the encouragement of self-help.

Our second mode of response concentrates on management. Here, broad strategies aimed at poverty alleviation and social protection are supported by efforts to build new management instruments and concepts. Management structures and systems are subjected to constant review via an administrative reform programme. Systems are installed to prevent abuse of welfare provisions by persons not entitled to benefits. Self-help programmes, backed by education and training, are designed to release as many people as possible from dependence on the State.

Thirdly, my Government is committed to building a network of social partnerships – among the State, employers, communities and civic non-governmental organizations. In this framework of collaborative action, all the social partners work out a division of duties and responsibilities; they negotiate relative inputs into social protection schemes and they determine the principles which should govern their management.

Over and above all this, we also encourage the labour movement to carry out its own defined programmes of education about structural adjustment and the changing role of the State, about the necessity for short-, medium– and long-term investment, as well as the need for individual responsibility in preparing for the future.

Yet we must go beyond country-specific initiatives to a framework for international collective action and, ultimately, to a global charter on social protection measures.

The Report has helpfully pointed to the need for policy cohesion and to the necessity for a clear definition of the role of the State. It has pointed to the need for flexible management systems and structures, and to the desirability of expanding benefits and access, among other things.

My delegation would urge this Conference to accept these and other stated guidelines as the essential starting-point. We would, however, be doomed to a false start if we did not take other matters into consideration.

All of us gathered here – representatives of labour unions, workers, employers, governments and non-governmental organizations – need to call in unison on donor countries and international lending agencies to take into consideration the serious matter of poverty alleviation when setting their conditionalities.

In the words of one of Jamaica's national heroes, the Right Excellent Marcus Mosiah Garvey: "Poverty is a hellish state to be in: it is no virtue. To be poor is to be hungry without possible hope of food; to be sick without hope of medicine; to be tired and sleepy without a place to lay one's head; to be naked without the hope of clothing; to be despised and comfortless. To be poor is to be a fit subject for crime and hell". That is the way of poverty. No one wants to be poor.

Economic development must be accorded priority, but that process must be designed and managed so as to give each and everyone a meaningful stake in providing a better way of life. A meaningful stake must be linked to exposure to education and training. For without public education and frameworks for self-help and social empowerment, we would simply be restructuring dependence on the State.

My Government stands ready to support the initiatives detailed in your Report and to identify with the practical recommendations which should emerge from this Conference. And, as we approach the twenty-first century, it is my hope that on leaving this Conference, all of us present here, governments, employers' and workers' representatives, will not only – in the words of a distinguished Guyanese poet – "sleep to dream, but dream to change the world".

We must commit ourselves to taking this bold step of providing social protection for all our people, in particular the most vulnerable groups. We have to work towards achieving this; we can and we must.

God bless you all.

Original Russian: Mr. GOMBOJAV (Minister of Population Policy and Labour, Mongolia) – On behalf of the Government delegation of Mongolia, and of myself, I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and to express the hope that, under their leadership, this session of the Conference will be able to carry out the tasks before it.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his unanimous re-election to the post of Director-General of the International Labour Office, and wish him every success in his activities aimed at helping workers throughout the world.

In this connection I would also like to welcome the delegations of those countries which have recently become members of the International Labour Organization.

Mongolia is going through one of the most difficult stages of its transitional period. The Government is directing its efforts at the unyielding implementation of democratic changes, and is taking measures aimed at a very rapid stabilization of the economy and the formation of the mechanisms of a market economy. The country is witnessing the reconstruction of the former State-owned monopolies. Today, some 70 per cent of the animal husbandry operations which have formed the basis of the economy of Mongolia is in the hands of the private sector. Trade and services are for the most part the responsibility of the private sector. The large economic units are subject to various forms of ownership, but the State still predominates. Soon we intend to privatize the housing fund. The privatization programme should be finished by the end of the year. A range of legislation concerning the economy has been approved and implemented, including the Act on taxes, foreign investments and so on.

Bearing in mind the principles of regulation in a market economy, measures are being taken to expand and strengthen the private sector, transfer land to be used by the population, to legalize prices, make the national currency convertible, to implement optimum financial and credit policies and outward-looking foreign trade policies, and stimulate exports. All these measures are aimed at providing a middle-term programme of economic and structural reconstruction, and have been agreed with the International Monetary Fund and other international financial and economic organizations.

Despite the measures adopted, the economy of our country is facing a serious crisis as a result of substantial changes in foreign economic relations and of the unavoidable problems and difficulties encountered during a transitional period.

Over the past three years we have seen a rapid fall in social production and indicators relating to per capita income in Mongolia show that it has fallen to levels last seen at the beginning of the 1980s. Enterprises and economic organizations are facing a shortage of raw materials, of necessary equipment and of spare parts. As a result of this, the volume of production has dropped and there is more insolvency, higher rates of inflation, and a sharp fall in minimum living standards. In this connection, the Government has been paying particular attention to provision of social guarantees to the population, and particularly to workers of organizations financed out of the state budget, pensioners and other vulnerable groups of the population.

The Report presented by the Director-General to this session of the Conference Social insurance and social protection deals with a topical issue and should be warmly welcomed. I share the view of the Director-General that one of the most important objectives of economic development for the next few decades will be the creation or restructuring of the social protection system, and to make sure that its level equals that of other countries and their rates of development.

As to my country, the state social security policies have been aimed at guaranteeing constitutional rights to pensions, allowances and other forms of social assistance with particular stress being laid on providing a reliable source of income for the rural population. The State alone used to be responsible for financing and guaranteeing such measures, in the context of a centrally planned economy, but this became unacceptable during the transition to a market economy.

In 1993 expenditure on social security is more than double the level of 1992: 89.5 per cent of this expenditure goes on pensions and allowances. About 60 per cent of expenditures on pensions and allowances is covered by the state budget. As the economic crisis in the country gets worse, it becomes more difficult to raise necessary finance. We have to solve the very difficult problem of restructuring the social security system in accordance with the principles of a market economy. With this purpose in mind, in 1992 we began work on studying and finding ways and means to set up a new social insurance system with the active assistance of the ILO and the UNDP. We have determined how to reform the present social security system, which provides insurance against occupational injury and unemployment as well as for pensions and medical insurance, and a separate fund will be set up for each form of insurance. Alongside the current system of deducting resources for social insurance from enterprises and economic organizations, an additional measure providing for direct deductions from workers' pay will be introduced. This will guarantee the necessary finance.

To guarantee an effective reform of the social insurance system, corresponding central and local organs will also be reorganized and given greater independence and a tripartite committee for social insurance will be set up and be accountable to Parliament. In this connection I would like to express the hope that we will continue cooperation in this area with the ILO.

Permit me to say just a few words pertaining to other matters on the agenda of the Conference.

The Mongolian delegation supports the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on the prevention of industrial accidents. We view as extremely topical the discussion of the question of the role of the ILO in technical cooperation. An all-round exchange of views on this subject will allow us to establish the priority directions for further ILO assistance to member countries. In this connection, we support the proposal of the Director-General concerning multi-disciplinary teams in the regions. This will help the ILO to react more effectively to the increasing needs and requirements of its members. It is for us a source of satisfaction that a number of measures we consider particularly important have recently been carried out within the framework of technical cooperation with the ILO. Thus for instance the ILO multidisciplinary team of experts has carried out a study of problems concerning labour, employment and the development of human resources. In April of this year we held jointly with the ILO a national symposium at which we discussed the conclusions of the report entitled "A policy of rational transfer to market relations" and adopted a number of recommendations concerning future priorities for technical cooperation with the ILO.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank from this rostrum and on behalf of the Mongolian Government the International Labour Office and its regional office in Bangkok for the invaluable technical support and assistance given to our country to help solve the social and economic problems we are now facing during the transitional period. Mongolia expresses its readiness to continue its active cooperation with the ILO.

In conclusion I should like to state that our country is currently carrying out preparatory work for the national celebration of the 75th anniversary of the creation of the ILO. Within this framework, provisions are being made for such measures as the ratification of various ILO Conventions, the publication of articles on the ILO and the holding of a press conference, etc.

Ms. ANDERSEN (Minister of Labour, Denmark) – On behalf of the Danish delegation, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him the best of success in performing his very important functions.

Let me also congratulate the Director-General on his re-election a few weeks ago. At the Conference last year, my delegation stated our support for his efforts to put new life into the ILO, respecting its unique structure. We still support such action and the Danish Government looks forward to further initiatives from the Director-General in this respect.

We also welcome the proposed reforms of the International Labour Conference and of the ILO Governing Body. We welcome the introduction of the concept of active partnership which should bring ILO closer to its member States.

Let me now turn to the agenda and express my compliments on the Report of the Director-General which forms the basis of this debate in the plenary sittings of the Conference.

The theme of the main Report this year is Social insurance and social protection. This topic is certainly essential, in a global perspective also.

I agree with the Director-General also when he stresses that even if the task may be enormous it is not impossible and that the ILO cannot act alone.

Allow me to concentrate on the aspects of social protection that relate directly to the labour market.

Unemployment is a global problem which is the cause of inequality, human tragedy and enormous economic problems, both in the industrialized world and in the developing countries.

In some countries the unemployment problems are overshadowed by even bigger and more serious problems, such as war and famine – problems which may be both consequences and causes of unemployment.

From these countries' point of view, the problems in my part of the world may seem marginal. But, as I see it, they are still very serious and cannot be ignored.

A classical solution to the unemployment problems is growth. But not very many countries have succeeded in turning economic development in a more favourable direction.

All over the world, efforts have been made in recent years to develop effective instruments against unemployment, but the continued high rate of unemployment clearly shows that we are not being very successful.

In the combat against unemployment we must use both old and well-known instruments. But that is not enough! New and untraditional methods will be necessary. These may be painful in the short term but, in the long term, new thinking will prove absolutely vital. What methods are to be developed depends on what part of the world we are talking about. My perspective is, of course, in the industrialized world.

First of all, we must take initiatives which prevent unemployment from becoming bigger. This vicious circle must be broken. And this surely applies to all parts of the world.

One of the central instruments to prevent unemployment – no matter where we live – is training. It is in particular important to ensure that all young persons have access to basic schooling and that they continue in further education or work when they leave the primary-school system.

When we look at the labour market in an industrialized country like Denmark, it is also important to ensure that the skills of the labour force will be constantly updated. Having said that, we must also ensure that the enterprises are given optimum production conditions at all times.

But we must, of course, also take initiatives so that those who have lost their jobs are offered continued training and job training in order to make it possible for them to return to the labour market.

Special action must be taken to assist persons who have been unemployed for a long period of time. Long-term unemployment often leads to social problems. A massive effort should be made to ensure that the long-term unemployed preserve their labour market attachment and that they do not lose their self-confidence.

The action taken should be based on the wishes and needs of the unemployed and on the requirements of the labour market. We must consider new and promising employment fields and new ways of organizing work.

The continued rapid development of new technology further increases the need for alternative distribution of the work available.

In this field, we have in Denmark introduced a number of experiments with leave schemes. Under these schemes, unemployed persons are taken on to fill the job of employed persons who are thus given a possibility to leave to undergo further training. These schemes have some very positive perspectives. They will improve conditions for those who are without a job and they will satisfy the need for training on the part of the enterprises and the individual employees.

Next year we will discuss the future and the role of the ILO on the brink of the twenty-first century. The ILO will be 75 years old and the Director-General will present us with a Report outlining his views on the many new and old challenges in the world of labour. How we tackle the present problems will determine future action and the appropriate response of the ILO – the only tripartite organization in the United Nations system.

(Mr. Badey takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. CARBONE RICO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Uruguay) – I would first of all like to congratulate the President for his election and for the way in which he is conducting the work of this Conference.

I also wish to express my satisfaction that several new States have joined the ILO; I am happy to greet and welcome their representatives.

The Director-General in his Report this year has selected the topic of social insurance and social protection. As he did last year, when he selected the topic of democratization, the Director-General has once again made a wise choice.

Without any doubt, there are no rights or freedoms without democracy. In the same way, we cannot think of democracy without social security and healthy economies.

Uruguay is considered as a pioneer in the creation and development of social security in Latin America. At the beginning of the 1960s Uruguay's social security was fully developed and was the leader in the region.

During the first half of the century the State, through its programmes of social security (basically those relating to the risks of disability, old age and survival), was able within a context of economic expansion to meet many needs before the demands were even voiced. The mid-1950s saw the prosperity of former decades come to an end, and ushered in a long period of crisis, largely the result of the fall in international prices for our exports, and of the protectionist measures of certain developed countries. In this context, social security in Uruguay was not spared. The state institutions responsible for managing the funds of disability, old-age and survivors' schemes found were coming up short and faced tremendous financial difficulties in meeting their commitments.

Various factors, including inefficient administration, accelerating inflation, and an unsuitable mechanism of adjustment led to a drastic drop in purchasing power.

The case of Uruguay is not an exception; similar problems are found in many other pioneering countries in Latin America.

Protection against disability, old age and death – our national pride in the past – became a paradigm of a society trapped in its past.

The abusive use of the level of benefits as a variable in the adjustment of the financial balance led a revolt among pensioners, who enjoyed widespread support from the rest of our population. From that point in time, pensions began to recover their purchasing power, with a growth of some 20 per cent annually. Between 1989 and 1993, the system's expenditures rose from 10.6 to approximately 14 points of GDP, or the equivalent of one year's exports.

For this reason, the additional pressure on both the wage and tax base has increased, thereby affecting the competitiveness of our products.

Because of this, both the National Institute of Statistics of the Faculty of Economic Sciences of the University of the Republic, as well as state institutions responsible for the administration of social security considered that the system might find itself in a serious crisis in the first decade of the next century, and lapse into an irreversible crisis in the next 15 years, leaving future generations unprotected.

One of the decisive factors in this situation is the demographic reality of our country.

In Uruguay, the drop in both the mortality and birth rates started early. In the 1950s the birth rate was already low: 21.23 per thousand, and falling. The annual average cumulative decline was 5.45 per thousand. Forecasts suggest that the birth rate will continue to fall, to approximately 15.79 per thousand in the period 2005-2010.

In Uruguay the minimum age of retirement is 55 for women and 60 for men. At these ages the life expectancy is 25.3 years for women and 16.9 years for men. Forecasts indicate that there will be a slow but sustained growth of these figures.

We would also like to note that the countries with age distributions similar to ours, (mostly countries in the developed world), have retirement ages ranging somewhere between 62 and 67 years of age.

The social security system in Uruguay provides broad coverage for economically active workers; contrary to what occurred in the case of old-age, disability and survivors' pensions, the organized social sectors were a driving force in developing sickness insurance, family allowances, maternity and child benefits.

Thus social security benefits, for both the economically active and pensioners cannot be viewed independently of social needs or national economic conditions.

Social security systems must be consistent with the economic realities in which they operate. The promotion of an efficient policy of social security, created through economic growth, will encourage the creation of wealth and savings, both of which are necessary to confront, collectively and individually, the growing demands for social protection.

It is necessary to ensure a balance between risks and expenditure through an overall correspondence between the funding capacity and the protection provided. Such a balance will facilitate the consolidation of protective systems within a context of economic and financial stability.

We should not shift to social security commitments which result from decisions quite foreign to its specific objectives, whether for economic reasons, for market reasons or for political reasons, which increase expenditure without additional funding.

Management must be efficient, decentralized, and responsible and open to social participation.

It is urgent to achieve the maximum of efficiency in the collection of contributions and taxes, and to ensure the proper use of available funds, so that social security systems may meet their obligations as regards protection.

These last points are shared by all Ibero-American countries; last year they signed a declaration to that end despite differences in their respective social security systems.

I wish to repeat here what I said earlier as regards the wisdom of the Director-General in selecting this theme for this year's session of the Conference. In fact we believe that we have demonstrated the importance of social security both from a social point of view, since it is necessary for society to develop machinery to protect against the various risks facing workers and non-workers, and also from the point of view of financial and economic health.

Therefore, one cannot analyse one without the other.

The political decisions which are adopted in this area call, without a doubt, for great responsibility and courage on the part of governments, political leaders and the people.

Their social and economic impact precludes stinginess. Decisions are necessarily transcendent because they involve not only the well-being of present generations but also that of future generations.

What we must avoid above all is to delay urgent decisions or to shy away from tackling the crucial issues.

These statements are true in any context, but particularly in the area of social security, not only because of their inherent value but also because, contrary to other fields, decisions in the field of social security do not have immediate results, but make themselves felt over time.

We are delighted with the development of Uruguay's social security, and the recovery of its purchasing power.

That is why we are firmly convinced that we should not diminish our efforts to enhance social security, to be able to cover new needs, and to ensure the certainty of benefits through an economically healthy and administratively efficient system.

As the President of Uruguay said "no social policy is possible if the economy is destroyed". Budget commitments must be realistic, and based on healthy economies, for a healthy economy is the basis of modern and democratic societies.

Mr. BALOPI (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) – Allow me, on behalf of the Botswana delegation, and in my own name, to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the Chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish also to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents, who will ably assist him in guiding our deliberations to successful conclusions.

My delegation appreciates and admires the ingenuity of the Office in placing before us year after year reports that are well prepared and which address issues that are very pertinent to the world of labour.

Indeed, with the Bhopal disaster and other catastrophes in the late 1980s, it is important that the world should continue to be reminded to work towards guarding against a repeat of such industrial accidents. The report on the prevention of major industrial disasters therefore merits our serious consideration. Although the issue of part-time work may not be totally relevant to the developing world, we look forward to the deliberations on the issue and the subsequent guidance provided by the Conference conclusions.

It is opportune that with the dwindling financial foreign assistance to most developing countries, the ILO should indeed review the role and impact of its technical cooperation programme to its constituents with a view to increasing it.

The steep decline in the disbursement of external assistance funds in the late 1980s and early 1990s to most of our developing countries is an indication that the only viable option for obtaining assistance is through technical cooperation as opposed to bilateral cooperation.

We note with satisfaction that the ILO is in the process of decentralizing its major functions by setting up multidisciplinary teams in different regions with the objective of being able to closely identify and monitor the needs and priorities of its member States and thereby provide technical advisory services.

My delegation welcomes this development. In this way technical cooperation programmes will address pertinent issues such as employment promotion, human resource development, enterprise and cooperative development, the promotion of awareness of member States regarding the problems of child labour and the need to strengthen their capacity to design and implement policies and programmes aimed at combating and eliminating child labour. There is also a need to examine women's role in employment, especially in the context of structural adjustment and during the transition to market-oriented economies.

We are meeting at a time when the world economies are going through a recessionary period, except for some signs of recovery in the developed world. Developing economies are confronted with economic recession, huge debts and slumping commodity prices. This comes against a background where most African countries have had to bow to the advice of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and to introduce structural adjustment programmes.

These reforms include substantial labour cuts, the removal of subsidies on basic commodities and key social sector services. No doubt this has adversely affected the poorer nations or sections of society. Consequently, such withdrawals of subsidies were met with protests that have not only destabilized some States but led to significant social disorders.

What we are witnessing today is a shrinkage in the financial base due to recession while restructuring has entailed substantial social costs, such as raising the level of unemployment, and weakened the social insurance and support that governments offer to the poorer sections of society.

The dilemma here therefore is while there is now a greater need to extend the net of social insurance and social protection outlined in the Director-General's Report, resources channelled towards this sector are becoming less available.

In developing countries governments have always found it difficult to raise the necessary funds either in tax or social security contributions because wage employment levels are significantly low. The majority of the labour force is engaged in subsistence agriculture; and as a result of the limited employment opportunities in the formal sector the informal sector has gained ascendancy in terms of employment creation. informal sector, however, remains no base for collecting taxes in the form of personal income tax. Hence governments' base for generating revenue is also very small.

The breakdown in traditional family relationships and social fabrics, accompanied by increasing urbanization and the resultant high unemployment rates in developing countries, have resulted in people looking to governments to provide some buffer against adversity.

Indeed, governments have a fundamental responsibility to ensure a basic minimum standard of living for their people. However, given the small revenue base for governments in developing countries, it is important that technical cooperation programmes should aim at developing the private sector which should in turn relieve governments from some of these obligations.

In Botswana, despite the significant economic growth and impressive expansion of social services, much remains to be done, especially in alleviating poverty and enhancing equitable distribution of resources.

However, public budgetary provision has tended to focus on the establishment of social services infrastructure supplemented by assistance targeted to the needy to ensure the attainment of a minimum standard of living. Resources have been made available to ensure the provision of basic needs such as primary health care, clean water supplies, shelter and free basic education.

Provision is also made for food aid for the destitute and for public works programmes during drought periods. These social measures are aimed at guaranteeing minimum standards of living for all our people.

In addition, an obligation regarding the payment of compensation relating to employment injury and absence due to confinement is imposed by legislation. An obligation to pay severance benefit to employees also exists in the private and parastatal sectors. Public servants are granted a pension and gratuity on retirement.

However, there is a need for a comprehensive social security scheme which will adequately address the needs of our society. The Government is considering the establishment of a national provident fund which will cover private sector employees.

Faced with the dilemma of diminishing financial resources, on the one hand, and the need to extend the social security net, on the other, it is our hope that when Botswana reviews her social security system the ILO, through its technical cooperation programme, will provide us with advice so that the system that Botswana eventually adopts will be viable and capable of sustaining itself without much government assistance.

While in Botswana we remain aware that it is important to create income-earning opportunities for the unemployed, to improve the productivity of the employed, to provide opportunities for the acquisition of skills relevant to wage employment and self-employment and to strengthen the capacity for needs assessment, we are also challenging the seemingly persistent perception that the Government should be looked at as the only active agent in the economic development process. Our view is that such a perception inhibits constructive initiative by other social partners. It is important to recognize that governments are nowadays limited agencies for economic change and development.

Governments can play a direct role in the provision of basic services which contribute directly to the potential productivity of the labour force. The creation of productive employment opportunities, the diversification of the economy and the establishment of effective economic linkage between rural and urban areas are largely private sector responsibilities.

In conclusion, let me assure you of my delegation's total support for the unanimous election of the President and its continued cooperation during the deliberations of the Conference.

Original French: Mr. JUNCKER (Minister of Labour, Minister of Finance, Luxembourg) – I should like first of all to offer my congratulations and those of my Government to the President on his election at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. His professional skill and personal qualities are sure to guide us successfully through the work of our Conference, which is called upon to discuss a number of very important topics.

My congratulations also go to Mr. Michel Hansenne, whose term of office as Director-General of the International Labour Organization has been renewed. I am confident that he and his collaborators will devote all their efforts to the service of the world of labour, as they have done in the past.

The Director-General of the Office has this year focused his deliberations on social insurance and social protection. This is in keeping with the efforts of the International Labour Organization in the field of social security, efforts which have been marked since 1945 by 11 standard-setting Conventions, of which the cornerstone has been the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102) and [illegible] invaluable technical cooperation in setting up and adapting social protection systems. The goal proclaimed in the Atlantic Charter, of enabling all people to live "in freedom from fear and want" remains the fundamental principle of the International Labour Organization.

Admittedly problems arise to different degrees reflecting different types of society. It is also true, depending on the country, that protection measures are adapted in different ways to human needs. Nevertheless, discussions in the international forums facilitate an exchange of ideas, promote cooperation between countries, and give direction to initiatives at the national level.

A common approach is all the more necessary in a world open to trade, in which social protection clearly has an effect on economic processes.

There is always the danger for social security systems that economic adjustments will be made at the expense of the protection guaranteed to workers.

Luxembourg devotes 23 per cent of GDP to social protection, and we are keenly aware of the threat posed by "social dumping", particularly in view of the fact that we regard the guarantee of adequate protection as one of the elements essential to social peace.

Luxembourg's social insurance system will soon be celebrating its 100th year. While originally set up to benefit workers, it has been extended gradually to cover the entire active population. The extension of protection to workers' families and to categories of people not in employment, such as young unemployed people or people drawing social assistance benefits, has ensured that the entire population is covered against various risks.

As a rule, benefit levels reflect the contributions made. However, this principle is often balanced by a corrective element to ensure a minimum level of benefits to the most disadvantaged groups. The system is funded by contributions from employers and workers, while the State, through fiscal measures, provides 38 per cent of social security revenue.

As in other countries, the Luxembourg system is encountering difficulties and challenges.

As the Director-General's Report rightly noted, "the developed countries have achieved universal access and high-quality provision offering to all quality care at virtually no cost to the recipient but with high and rapidly growing costs to the community at large". The expectations of those insured that they will receive the best possible care, the advances being made in the medical sciences, and the growth in the range of care on offer naturally tend to create an imbalance between revenue and expenditure in health insurance. Bringing these costs under control is thus a constant source of concern.

The ageing of the population represents an additional burden both with regard to health insurance and pensions. This ageing and the consequent rise in the number of dependent older people calls for an extension of social insurance to cover dependency.

Demography changes, characterized by falling birth rates, will fundamentally alter the balance between active and inactive populations.

The growing levels of expenditure will necessitate higher contributions to finance the pension system. Some countries are attempting to reduce expenditure by limiting the role of state pension schemes to providing basic benefits, while the private sector makes up any shortfall. Luxembourg has hitherto eschewed this course, since it involves the danger that gross discrepancies will appear in old-age, sickness and widowhood.

Economic and social changes have fundamental repercussions on social protection systems, and structural adjustments in industry make it necessary to adapt the existing means of integration and reintegration at work. I therefore recently proposed as a way of remedying the difficulties of hiring older workers that enterprises who recruit such workers should be exempted from the relevant social charges.

It is particularly important at times of economic difficulty that social security systems demonstrate their effectiveness.

To guarantee sufficient resources to all people prevented by poor health, by age or by economic circumstances from earning the means to live remains the fundamental goal of any social security system. To allow everyone to live in dignity, without fear of poverty, remains the duty of all social policy. Whatever the difficulties, whatever the challenges, we must confront them, and we must not opt for easy solutions but rather tackle the problems with imagination and generosity.

Original French: Mr. ORY (Workers' delegate, Hungary) – I should like first of all to congratulate the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him excellent success in fulfilling this responsible task.

Having examined the Report of the Director-General on the ILO's activities last year, I should like to say that we ourselves have taken part in many programmes and much consultation and technical cooperation, which we as representatives of Hungarian employees highly appreciate. Questions pertaining to employment, privatization and social security are the most important ones at present for us in Hungary, the people are no longer in a state of euphoria about the fall of the dictatorial regimes and the possibility of democratic change. Everyday life has shown us the other face of the change in regime, which brings good fortune to a minority and which, for now, translates into a heavier burden and more uncertainty as to living and working conditions for most employees.

Unfortunately, it is true the economic recession and restructuring referred to in the Report have had an impact first and foremost on social institutions and benefits. The solution to the financial and institutional crisis afflicting the social institutions of the formerly socialist countries of Eastern and Central Europe requires, beyond the national level, effective international solidarity. The ILO was among the first organization to have recognized this fact. I would like to welcome in this connection the decision of the ILO to open a regional office in Budapest.

We appreciate all the training, tripartite consultations and studies aimed at transforming the countries of Eastern and Central Europe, including Hungary. They should lead to the establishment of social systems in harmony with the standards of the ILO and make it possible to guarantee the free movement of persons and of capital. However, one cannot refer to the free movement of persons unless each country is able to ensure fundamental social rights and social security schemes are harmonized.

Apart from the extension of individual liberties, the harmonization of social schemes is the only way to allow for the establishment of health and retirement unemployment benefits. This is an essential condition for the young democracies of Eastern and Central Europe to avoid social unrest.

Transforming the economy in Hungary amounts to establishing the market economy. However, advocates of "economic efficiency" are increasingly likely to forget that a social policy aimed at providing full employment and a decent existence for all is an integral part of the advanced market economy. Unfortunately, we are now conscious of the fact that this is not unanimously understood.

Those who benefit from the unbridled capitalism which is now taking hold in our country do not or cannot take this into account. And we cannot tell whether the international organizations, such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the OECD and some other European institutions are aware of the fragility of the new democracies.

There are growing numbers of people for whom freedom in no way means new opportunities. On the contrary, these people think nostalgically of a time when health care, albeit modest, was accessible, available and taken for granted by practically everyone, when pensions were low, but they could rely on them, and when no one spoke of unemployment. Poverty, the uncertainty of the future and unemployment have shocked people, and it has not yet been possible to set up individual or collective protection mechanisms to offset these negative impressions. I should like therefore to draw your attention to the fact that currently in Eastern and Central Europe it is no longer enough to say that it was the previous dictatorships that left social schemes in the red. It is necessary to create a foundation for social policy and employment. We must be very cautious while proceeding with progressive economic rationalization. There is a saying about a surgeon who boasted that his operation was a success, but the patient died. We must bear in mind that people's understanding can only go so far.

The trade unions in Hungary agree that the way to avoid a social explosion in the economic transition process is to reach an agreement among the social partners – the government, trade unions and employers – on how to distribute the cost in a fair manner. In the past few years, we have gained sufficient experience in the field of tripartite harmonization of interests. We also learned how this works, to the point where we can now see very clearly that truly stable agreements hinge upon the stability of the social partners themselves. In these past few years we have witnessed a number of debates and even conflicts between trade unions in Hungary. Although these disputes have for the most part been settled, it was only last month, after the elections for the management committees for social security and for enterprise committees, that we were able to go beyond the debate on legitimacy and to state that strengthening trade unions improves the chances of a social agreement of a global character. On 21 May, an election was held in Hungary to set up the social security management committees. Voters chose among candidates from competing trade unions, so these elections also served to rate the unions. The authorities did not take part in the elections. The people, who were somewhat tired of the debate between political parties, turned out massively to vote, thus demonstrating to the politicians that liberty alone is not sufficient, and that they are ready to act in the interests of security. Some 40 per cent of Hungarian voters participated in the elections. That is an unprecedented rate which demonstrates unequivocally the fact that the competing trade unions carried out a decent and positive campaign. There is no doubt that this process should be used by the employers as well. At present, it is the employers' organizations that participate in the process of tripartite harmonization at the national level. This is important: it leaves some employers without representation. At the same time as we privatize and change forms of ownership, we should see some stable internal solidarity taking shape. In the current situation we are able to reach agreements with the employers' representatives. In certain cases, though, owners or employers will not respect the tripartite agreements reached. Such a situation cannot continue for long. We have learned that it is not enough to adopt technocratic gimmicks while reforming distribution systems and streamlining. We also have to help change the behaviour of the social partners.

International labour standards are to be observed, trade union rights respected and faith in seriously beleaguered social institutions restored, the support and building of employers' and workers' organizations must be given greater attention through technical cooperation. This is another field where the international community can assist the countries of Central and Eastern Europe now undergoing transformation.

In conclusion, it can be said that during the transformation, as social security institutions are integrated into the economy, account should be taken not only of the capacity of the economy but also of the capacity of the people. In order for it to become possible to meet this most natural requirement, it is necessary, in technical cooperation, not only to cooperate with the trade unions and the representatives of the employers but also to help them evolve and help strengthen them.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – On behalf of the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), we would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election. Might we also be allowed to express our satisfaction at the well-deserved re-election of Mr. Michel Hansenne as Director-General of the ILO.

The central issue of the Director-General's Report, social insurance and social protection, is both topical and important. The World Confederation of Labour considers it of the very greatest importance and several of its delegates have presented a special resolution on this subject. Although we have reservations on some aspects of the Report, we recognize the efforts made, and in particular we would like to underscore the importance of social security as a key element in solidarity and in the democratic system. We recognize it as a responsibility which cannot be delegated and which is necessary for efficient State administration. For this reason we agree with the Director-General when he says that social expenditures merit a higher degree of protection against policies of economic stabilization and monetary restriction.

We must draw attention to the important supplementary elements in the Director-General's Report. The report on the territories of Palestine occupied by Israel highlight a dramatic situation which the WCL firmly condemns. The special report on apartheid is also a demonstration of the urgent need to terminate immediately every aspect of this abnormal system.

We very much regret that here in Europe, merely two hours away from Geneva by plane, a real genocide is taking place against the Muslim population of the Republic of Bosnia. There, among other innocent people, thousands and thousands of workers are held prisoner, have been injured or killed. We demand a cessation to this aggression and a stronger, effective presence of the United Nations.

We, for our part, denounce very energetically and with deep concern the increasing trade union repression. The advance of democracy in recent years, to which the trade union movement has made a significant contribution, is now experiencing a serious and permanent retrogression. Trade unionists have been taken prisoner in Morocco, Colombia and Malawi, and there is repression against trade unionists and workers in Côte d'Ivoire, Peru and Bahrain.

These are merely some of the specific expressions of the deterioration of human rights and trade union rights in a large number of countries. Violations of these rights become even more odious when they affect migrant workers and refugees. Today we are seeing a dangerous increase in acts of racism and xenophobia which seriously undermine the values of the ILO and human and basic social rights.

We are also witnessing a new neo-liberal offensive which seeks to reduce the real and complex concept of development to mere exaltation of the market. Of course we all want an efficient economy where certain market rules of competitivity are taken into account. But although the market is important, it is just one more instrument in the economy, and it cannot be the sole motive and sole objective because social aspects, the role of the State, the rationalization of development programmes, the proper application of new technologies, ecological protection, participation and social concertation, distribution of wealth are all fundamental aspects too of true development. Simple growth and macro-economic figures are not adequate indices, and very frequently mask profound injustices and the seeds of instability.

This economic model, which we call neo-liberal because it disregards the social component, increases imbalances and enables economic and financial power to be concentrated, also has its counterpart in the present international disorder and in the unjust explosive relationship between north and south.

International trade, the mechanisms relating to the external debt and the scandalous contradiction of the protectionist policies practised by the industrialized countries – at a time when the underdeveloped countries are being required to open up their markets – are all expressions of a worsening economic situation which is further reflected in unemployment, massive emigration, increasing marginalization and poverty – dramatic features of the current economic and social disorder at the international level.

In the light of this situation, the ILO has a specific important role to play. In renovating and renewing things, we must also respect the original ideals of its Constitution, that is to say, to defend the rights of the workers and promote their social justice. Here, the ILO has made a major contribution through its standard-setting policy which today is under serious threat, although we feel that its fundamental aspects have to be preserved by improving the supervisory machinery and calling upon governments to make the necessary ratifications and applications. Social retrogression, the cheapening of labour, the loss of purchasing power, the reduction of jobs and, to a large extent, "labour flexibilization" form a vicious circle which in addition to human injustice greatly diminish the possibilities of expansion and growth of the economy.

Unilateral modifications of labour legislation and certain reform projects, and here I am sorry to have to say so, the denunciations made by trade unionists in Argentina, are acts which the governments which subscribe to the international labour Conventions should not allow to occur.

The trade union movement has argued that the inclusion of a "social clause" in trade agreements would help promote greater equality in working conditions. We see this proposal as an act of solidarity between the workers which on the one hand may be one way of promoting social rights and minimum standards of living and ending pittance-level wages and, on the other, prevent social dumping and protect the workers of the industrialized countries.

However this so-called "social clause" could be converted into a new protectionist instrument, and what is much more serious yet, into an instrument of unilateral manipulation. Therefore the WCL feels that the "social clause" should be applied through a mechanism which is flexible, well designed, objective and impartial. Here we suggest that the ILO set up a special tripartite committee, with the assistance of experts and on the basis of the ten most important international labour Conventions since the ILO is the body which would be the most appropriate for ensuring the correct application of the "social clause". We submit this idea to the Office and to the Governing Body.

We would also like to mention the World Summit for Social Development which is being convened by the United Nations in 1995. It is a very important development and demonstrates the growing awareness that political instability at both the national and international levels is closely linked to social instability and individual insecurity. As Ambassador Somavia, Chairman of the Preparatory Committee of that Summit has said, poverty, unemployment and social disintegration are continuing to grow. The WCL attributes great importance to the preparation and the holding of this Summit, and we have requested that, in addition to the participation of trade union organizations at all levels, the ILO, because of its objectives, experience and membership, should play an important role in the preparation and holding of this Summit.

The WCL is concerned by these subjects and will hold its 23rd Congress on the continent of Africa in November of this year as a sign of hope and solidarity with our brothers in Africa. The theme of that congress will be "An Alternative World Order" and we shall examine the challenges to trade unions and the responses proposed by the WCL. With imagination and realism we think that we can meet the tremendous challenges with which we are faced. The ILO will be celebrating its 75th anniversary in 1994. The WCL will celebrate its own 75th birthday the following year. We want to celebrate simultaneously the 75 years of cooperation between the ILO and the WCL, renewing our hope in the common values of human dignity, the superior value of work, real solidarity between men and peoples and the primary importance of social justice.

Mr. RUITENBERG (representative of the International Federation of Air Traffic Controllers Associations) – My name is Bert Ruitenberg, which is a Dutch name. It is my privilege today to represent IFATCA, the International Federation of Air Traffic Controllers Associations, in my capacity as the executive Vice-President Professional of the Federation.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the present session of this distinguished Conference and also to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office.

IFATCA feels honoured to be granted the opportunity to speak at this session. Since this is the first time we do so, allow me to begin by introducing our Federation to you and to touch upon the relationship between the IFATCA and the ILO. After that, I will talk about a topic which is very much at the forefront in air traffic control circles these days: privatization of the air traffic control, the consequences thereof for our working conditions and in particular its possible detrimental effect on what is air traffic control's primary concern: air safety. Notice how this ties in with the Conference themes, social security and prevention of industrial disasters.

But first, a brief introduction to IFATCA.

IFATCA is the independent non-profit, non-political, non-industrial, professional organization representing controllers in more than 80 countries worldwide. The Federation actively participates in working groups and panels of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). IFATCA also maintains a close working relationship with the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations (IFALPA), the International Air Transport Association (IATA), the International Labour Office (ILO), the European Civil Aviation Conference (ECAC), and working groups on aviation matters in the European Parliament.

Amongst IFATCA's objectives are: to promote safety, efficiency and regularity in international air navigation; to assist and advise in the development of safe and orderly systems of air traffic control; to promote and uphold a high standard of knowledge and professional efficiency among air traffic controllers; and to protect and safeguard the interests of the air traffic control profession.

For this latter objective IFATCA has maintained a close relationship with the ILO for many years. One of the highlights of this relationship was the Meeting of Experts on Problems concerning Air Traffic Controllers, convened by the ILO in 1979, from which a report containing 52 conclusions on air traffic control working conditions was the result.

Since then, those 52 conclusions have been used in many cases by air traffic controllers all over the world when negotiating with their employers for improvements in their working conditions. Several conclusions were the basis for IFATCA policies on professional matters, policies that are still used today.

At our 32nd annual conference, held in April this year in Christchurch, New Zealand, the 52 conclusions were reviewed for their validity in today's working environment. The IFATCA Conference found most of the conclusions as valid today as they were in 1979, thus countering the recent argument of some employers that "material of 1979 is to be considered outdated".

Air traffic control has traditionally been a part of the civil service system in almost all countries, for it is the responsibility of governments to provide air traffic services in their airspace, but of late there is a strong trend to remove air traffic control from the civil service and make it an independent organization that is responsible to the Government for its operation. This trend is generally referred to as privatization of air traffic control, although in some cases the word commercialization would be more appropriate.

This privatization of air traffic control is seen by some people as a panacea for all existing problems in the current system, problems such as understaffing, inability to cope adequately with changing traffic demands and offering terms of employment to air traffic controllers that are commensurate with their high degree of specialization and responsibility.

Experience shows that indeed a number of those problems are solved or at least handled better in countries that have privatized their air traffic control services. But it is only fair to say that some problems appear to remain unsolved and, what is worse, privatization is creating some unforeseen problems of its own.

In most cases where air traffic control is privatized, we see that the major changes in the structure of the organization are in the top levels. The managers are no longer career-civil servants – they are career-managers, often with a commercial background. Another change is that the organization no longer runs on a government budget but has to operate out of its own income.

This inevitably leads to a highly commercial organizational set-up: air traffic control becomes a product that has to generate a profit to allow the organization to run and even expand where and when necessary. So, after a while, management starts looking for areas where expenses can be cut and finds that staff costs is an area where a lot of the money goes. The next logical step seems to be either to reduce the number of staff or to make better use of the existing number by increasing their productivity.

which in air traffic control means having them work longer hours. At first glance, this looks okay.

But what tends to be forgotten is that air traffic control's primary product is safety, and it is almost impossible to attach a price tag to that product. If controllers work only for a limited amount of hours at a stretch, and a limited number of stretches per day, that is because they need to be fully concentrated all the time when working in the interest of safety. Therefore, the commercial way of thinking should not apply to air traffic control in this respect.

IFATCA urges governments and other employers of air traffic controllers not to overlook air traffic control's primary goal, that is, the provision of safe air navigation, when considering privatizing air traffic control or determining working conditions in a privatized environment. The contents of the 52 conclusions of the 1979 ILO Meeting of Experts were agreed upon with air safety in mind and are therefore as applicable to air traffic control in the civil service as to privatized air traffic control.

If some commercially-oriented managers think safety is expensive, we suggest they consider the financial ramifications of an aviation accident. IFATCA believes that at the end it is more cost-effective to maintain a healthy air traffic control system with controllers who perform efficiently at all times whilst controlling traffic, even if that means employing more staff than in a strictly commercial organization. The safety standard in aviation is high, in no small part thanks to air traffic control. IFATCA likes it to stay that way.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – I give the floor to Mr. Tirumurti, Government adviser, India, who would like to use his right to reply concerning the statement that was made on Tuesday, 8 June, by the delegate of Pakistan. I would like to warn Mr. Tirumurti that his statement must relate to the substance of what was said, and must not exceed two minutes; it must be conducted in parliamentary language.

Mr. TIRUMURTI (Government adviser, India) – My delegation has taken the floor to set the record straight in regard to the charges made against my country by the delegate of Pakistan.

The reference made by him to the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir is a blatant interference in the internal affairs of my country as that state is an integral part of India. This reference, therefore, deserves to be categorically rejected.

There is no call for any fact-finding mission to Jammu and Kashmir as it is quite clear that the present disturbed conditions there are due to Pakistan's support for religion-based terrorism. Terrorist groups, armed and trained by Pakistan, are the prime agents of terror unleashed against innocent civilians in Jammu and Kashmir. This gives lie to Pakistan's feigned concern for workers in Jammu and Kashmir. If indeed its concerns on this account were genuine, it would not have aided and abetted such terrorist activities. The reality of the causes of the situation in Jammu and Kashmir has been camouflaged by a carefully designed and executed plan involving terrorist violence, coercion and a motivated smear campaign.

Jammu and Kashmir, like other parts of the country, is open. There is no bar on visits there by individual journalists, members of the diplomatic community, etc. Indian human rights organizations are free to conduct investigations in all parts of the country including Jammu and Kashmir. Since January 1992, about 9,000 foreigners, including nearly 100 journalists, have visited it.

Pakistan's call for self-determination in Jammu and Kashmir is an attempt to undermine India's secular fabric and its territorial integrity. The selective advancement of this principle applied to constituent units of sovereign States strikes not only at the territorial integrity of nations but also at international order and well-being.

Report of the Director-General on the Situation of Workers of the Occupied Arab Territories: Discussion

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like now to open this special sitting devoted to the discussion of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, which constitutes Appendix II of the Report of the Director-General.

Before I open the discussion, I should like, first of all, to repeat what I said this morning. I urge you all to comply with the truly democratic and parliamentarian tradition. I am confident that you will all cooperate in this spirit.

Secondly, we have 51 speakers this afternoon, and I would like each one to have his rightful share of the time available. That is why I call on you to keep to the time limit, which is 7 minutes. Of course, exception is made for those who speak on behalf of large groups.

Thirdly, we all have a right of reply. This right may be exercised at the end of the sitting. However, it should not exceed two minutes.

We have before us a very important question – a question that is dealt with in the Report of the Director-General fairly and seriously. I would like to urge you to stick to the subject of the Report, which is an integral part of the general Report of the Director-General presented for discussion in accordance with article 12 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. I think that this Report was excellent in numerous respects and for several reasons. Firstly, it reflects various points of view in all objectivity in a context that is extremely complicated. Moreover, as you can see from paragraph 148 of the Report, the key to the problem is the end of the "state of military occupation [which] renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain fundamental standards and principles that have been developed by the International Labour Organization are to be fully respected". Lastly, in paragraph 161 the Report stresses the need for dialogue, and emphasizes that the time has perhaps come to consider further ways in which more direct dialogue might be established between the parties.

Here I would like to express my thanks to the Director-General of the ILO and the members of the mission who visited the region. The excellent report before us is truly worthy of appreciation.

I would also like to refer to paragraph 147 of the Report, which shows that the mission to Israel and the occupied Arab territories, on which this report is based, was again carried out with the full cooperation of all the parties concerned, both Israeli and Palestinian. I hope that this spirit of cooperation will reign over our discussions.

That being said, I should now like to open the discussion.

Original Arabic: Mr. ISMAIL KHALIL (representative of Palestine) – I should first like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for his valuable and comprehensive Report and I should also like to thank the members of the mission that visited Palestine and the occupied Arab territories for their efforts to establish and record the facts and the abuses perpetrated, which demonstrate the horrible sufferings of our Palestinian people in their homeland under offensive Israeli occupation for over a quarter of a century.

We are meeting at this session for the fourth year to review the tragic and historically unique situation of an entire people whose possessions have been confiscated, their rights violated and their houses destroyed, and who have been driven from their land to make room for people who have no connection with that land. We come here this year to tell you of the most abhorrent forms of murder and oppression to which our people are subjected. The Report of the Director-General presents you with a really terrible picture of sufferings and torture, of poverty and oppression and every day we can provide more facts and figures that add to the painful and harrowing picture that must stir the conscience and move the heart of anybody who believes in the principles of freedom and dignity.

We come to you in the certainty that you will help to enforce the principles of truth and justice and to put an end to injustice and tragedy. We are aware that deep inside you feel sorrow and distress at what is going on but nobody is under the illusion that rights may be recovered through sorrow and distress alone. It was this realization that gave rise to our people's courageous intifada so as to show the world that we are a people that deserve to live, that have the same right as every other people to affirm their existence in their own land. Can anyone be denied that right, which is guaranteed under international law and by the Charter of the United Nations? Our people affirm that right by sacrificing the lives of men, women, old people and children, defending their land and their pride and dignity. What a strange contrast between the hand of a child throwing stones and the hand of an occupying soldier pressing a trigger indiscriminately! What comparison is there between stones and knives in the hands of the oppressed and instruments of mass destruction in the hands of the forces that invade and occupy our land and nation?

In spite of that, we responded to the world's appeal to comply with international resolutions which deprived us, as you know, of most of our rights and our land. We sought peace in a spirit of honesty, sincerity and tolerance, accepting resolutions 242 and 338 and participating first in the Madrid Conference and then in the Washington talks. And what has Israel's attitude been during the nine rounds of negotiations? Every day brings practical evidence of its refusal of peace as it continues to build settlements and to confiscate land, promulgates the present laws that prevent workers from doing their jobs, imposes oppressive taxes on industrial and agricultural goods, closes markets to them, prevents people from moving freely even within their own occupied land, seals off the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip, prevents Muslims and Christians from visiting their places of worship in Jerusalem and Bethlehem, keeps people from their homes and drives them beyond borders. Since last year's session of your Conference, the Israeli authorities have taken the unprecedented step of sealing off the occupied areas on the pretext of maintaining security. As a result, 120,000 workers have been deprived of their jobs so that the unemployment ratio has now risen to over 40 per cent. Israel's aim in this is to expose the Palestinian people to extremely harsh economic conditions that may eventually result in famine. Israel claims to be trying to create jobs within the occupied territories but that is nothing more than propaganda at a time when it is placing obstacles in the way of investment in the occupied territories by promulgating military ordinance No. 1234, which limits investment by preventing investors from withdrawing funds from a project during the first three years, a condition that is contrary to the very idea of encouraging investment anywhere in the world.

In this tragic situation, is it not our right to call on this august gathering through the Governing Body and the Director-General to take all necessary steps to alleviate the sufferings of our Palestinian people in the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip and of the Arab inhabitants of the Golan Heights and the other occupied Arab territories? Basing ourselves on the ILO's social and moral mandate and responsibility, we propose to this session of the Conference the following measures that could help lessen the sufferings of our workers and our people: (1) appointment of a resident representative of the ILO in the occupied Palestinian territories to monitor the situation of workers and employers and to provide them with the necessary protection; (2) establishment of a special unit within the International Labour Office to monitor developments and find appropriate solutions to the problems encountered by workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories; (3) establishment of a standing committee within the framework of the International Labour Conference, one of whose primary tasks would be to discuss the Report of the Director-General on this matter, to make recommendations for adoption by the Conference and to assist the International Labour Office in implementing relevant decisions of your Conference; (4) transmission of a request to the International Labour Office to prepare an integrated programme of technical assistance, including training programmes, and to provide existing training centres with equipment that enables them to perform their tasks efficiently and in accordance with the needs of the Palestinian economy; (5) transmission of a request to the Director-General to make representations to the competent Israeli authorities with a view to having them restore the unjustly withheld entitlements of the Palestinian workers to that they can be invested in productive and vital projects on behalf of those workers and their dependants.

Lastly, we hope that next year the picture will not be even more gloomy and terrible for our workers in their occupied land, defending the lofty principles that your Organization seeks to enforce. We further hope that you will give this matter your careful attention and consideration.

Mr. LARSEN (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Denmark) – (speaking on behalf of the European Community).

The European Community and its member States hold the Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, for which we thank the Director-General, to be an important document, providing much valuable information. In this respect, the Community and its member States are pleased to note that the representatives of the Director-General in preparing the Report have benefited from the full cooperation of all parties concerned.

The issue of the situation in the occupied territories is of the greatest importance to the Middle East peace process. The Community and its member States remain firmly committed to the Madrid peace process and its search for a just, lasting, and comprehensive solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Palestinian question on the basis of United Nations Security Council resolutions Nos. 242 and 338.

We believe that a successful conclusion of the peace process is a prerequisite of peace, stability, and a sustainable development in the region. The successful outcome will, by itself, be conducive to social and economic progress and thus to the full observance of the standards enshrined in the instruments of the ILO.

The European Community and its member States urge all parties concerned to refrain from all acts of violence in order not to hinder the ongoing peace process. The recent closure of the occupied territories by the Israeli authorities has further emphasized the need to address the problems there. Not least, the separation of the West Bank from East Jerusalem has increased the magnitude of social and economic problems for the Palestinians, including also a severing of cultural and person-to-person contacts and activities.

The European Community and its member States welcome the information provided in the Director-General's Report and the concrete efforts made by the Israeli Government to increase investment and create employment in the territories. However, and despite the steps taken, the economic hardship for the workers involved caused by the closure is clear, and there is an urgent need to take further steps to enable development of overall economic activity and employment in the occupied territories. In this respect, the matter of easing of restrictions on the Palestinian private sector, with a view to expanding and creating additional jobs, should also be addressed.

Such measures would not only be essential to the economic development of the occupied territories on its own right, they would also constitute important confidence-building measures to facilitate the peace talks. Lack of improvements on this ground remain an obstacle to progress on the core bilateral issues and risk undermining the legitimacy of those who are committed to the peace process.

It is in this spirit that the European Community and its member States, in December 1992, proposed to the different parties in the region a list of measures which would make economic life in the territories easier. In this respect, I will not fail to mention the still existing potential for further confidence-building measures as regards settlements. This question is also highlighted in the Director-General's Report, where it is stated that his representatives [in 1979] found it difficult to imagine that the settlements policy of the Israeli authorities could be pursued without conflicting with the objective of development by and for the local population, and therefore without it jeopardizing their chances of employment.

Let there be no doubt about the preoccupation of the Community and its member States with the situation in the occupied territories. In this connection we recall our commitment to continued, substantial humanitarian and economic aid to the occupied territories. And we urge the Director-General to continue to promote the technical cooperation activities of the ILO for the benefit of the workers in the occupied territories.

However, aid from the Community and its member States and from the ILO and elsewhere cannot and should not substitute for efforts within the framework of the Middle East peace process to bring about lasting solutions. We therefore hope that the negotiations will produce early and substantial results. If so, by this time next year we might see fundamental improvements in the situation of the workers in the occupied territories. Improvements that could also be reflected in the next Report of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALY KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – I am speaking on behalf of my country, the Syrian Arab Republic, and on behalf of the Arab group that has honoured me to be their spokesman at this important sitting on the discussion of the report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. We have given this Report our undivided attention, characterized as it is by transparency and objectivity and seriousness – in spite of our observations on some of the terminology used. But this does not undermine the importance of the report. We, the Arab group, have felt it appropriate to put forward our observations in writing to the Director-General so that he might take account of them in future. We noted particularly the disappearance of the name Palestine from the Report, and other inaccurate nomenclature, such as "population" instead of Arab citizens. Furthermore, it is unacceptable to consider the Israeli settlers as inhabitants of the Golan Heights, because their existence is illegal and runs contrary to international Conventions and resolutions.

The Arab group would like to express its appreciation to the ILO mission for fulfilling its international duty to search for the truth and gather and analyse information. It was totally justified in drawing the attention of the international community to the grave consequences of the social, economic and labour problems resulting from the continuation of the military occupation for more than 25 years and the hardening of Israel's settlement policy – not to mention the confiscation of land, water resources and other natural resources in occupied Palestine, Syrian Golan and other occupied Arab territories.

We note that the recommendations of this mission have also fallen on the deaf ears of the Israeli occupation authorities this year, as they are still continuing with their practices against the Arab people of Palestine and violating the rights and principles enshrined in the documents and instruments of the ILO. They have defied the international community by imposing the economic blockade and the closure of the occupied territories since last March.

What is amazing is that despite all these violations, these authorities are still convincing themselves, or rather trying to deceive the world, that their occupation is a "heavenly blessing" and that they are carrying out a mission to improve the social life and economic and living conditions of the Arab people of Palestine, which has been famous for its traditions, history, civilization and culture for centuries: a people which has demonstrated its refusal of occupation by the "intifada", gaining the respect of the international community because of the lawfulness of its demands.

There is no time to dwell in detail on the suffering of the Palestinian Arab people in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the Syrian Arab people in occupied Golan. The Director-General has spared us this effort, because he sums up their tribulations in paragraph 5(i) of his report: "the continuing state of occupation, which was in its 25th year, of the West Bank (including East Jerusalem), the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, rendered impossible a situation in which the standards and principles enunciated in ILO instruments could be fully respected": this upholds the wording of your resolution of 1974, which states that "any occupation of territory following aggression constitutes in itself a permanent violation of basic human rights and in particular of trade union and social rights".

At the same time the Director-General expressed, in paragraph 5 (ix), the ILO's grave concern about the grave consequences of the establishment and expansion of settlements. The International Labour Conference already condemned this policy in 1980 and called upon the occupying authorities to put an end immediately to the creation of settlements in Palestine and in the other occupied territories, including Jerusalem.

The conclusions of the Director-General on the suffering of the Palestinian workers and people have just been upheld by the President of the International Committee of the Red Cross two weeks ago, when he vehemently condemned Israel for its treatment of Palestinians in the West Bank and in the occupied Gaza Strip for violating many principles in the IVth Geneva Convention concerning the protection of civilians in time of war; he recalled that under the Convention, any confiscation of goods or deportation was illegal.

In the face of this unprecedented situation in the annals of humanitarian issues before you, with the exception of apartheid which you have succeeded in eliminating, your Organization, which has rightly earned the reputation of defender of justice, is called upon to take the necessary measures to prevent a worsening of the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and in the occupied territories. The Arab group is confident that the Governing Body and the ILO, in view of their in-depth studies of the situation for more than 20 years, will be able to propose appropriate solutions to the problem at the next session of the Conference.

In this respect, I support the proposal to set up a Standing Conference Committee and to create a permanent ILO presence in occupied Palestine in order to follow developments closely and to propose solutions to protect Palestinian workers against discrimination, to return to them their due rights and to step up technical assistance programmes to help them cope with the repercussions of colonization and military occupation.

In conclusion, we are of the view that the ILO should increase its activity in organizing regional seminars and carrying out studies and research on economic and social matters to pave the way for the next stage in the history of Palestine which will, with the grace of God, see the end of Israeli occupation and colonization; for any occupation, whatever its duration, is doomed to failure.

Original Arabic: Mr. IJAZ-UL-HAQ (Minister of Labour, Manpower and Overseas Pakistanis, Pakistan) – In the Name of God, the Most Merciful, the Most Compassionate, I would like to thank the President for giving me the floor and thus providing me with the opportunity to address this special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. We must also thank the Director-General for his Report and the members of the mission who visited the occupied Arab territories. It is our sincere hope that our collective efforts will contribute towards alleviating the conditions of the workers in the occupied territories.

We have carefully studied the Report of the Director-General. Unfortunately, the findings of the mission do not indicate any improvement in the situation. The Report provides ample testimony of gross violations of human rights, the continuation of the policy of settlements in the occupied territories and denial of all civil and political rights. In fact there has been a marked deterioration in economic, religious, educational and other rights of the subjugated population. The denial of trade union rights and freedom of association and the enforcement of partisan employment policies are, in particular, dangerous for the labour force. In other words the entire social fabric of the Palestinian population stands utterly destroyed.

It is regrettable to note that in total disregard of the Charter of the United Nations and its resolutions and in defiance of international law and of all public opinion the Israelis are continuing with their policies of terrorizing the Palestinian population which is aimed at breaking the will of those people and preventing them from continuing their just struggle to achieve their inalienable right to self-determination. Jewish settlements, the closing of the territories and other pressures are the tactics systematically applied in the occupied territories to liquidate and expel the Palestinian population and to confiscate their lands for transfer to settlers.

Let me quote from the Director-Generals Report: "it can only be repeated that a state of military occupation renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain fundamental standards and principles that have been developed by the International Labour Organization are to be fully respected. The massive military presence in the occupied Arab territories and the huge array of military rules, regulations and security measures that govern practically every aspect of the daily lives of the population of these territories, all place very severe restrictions on the workers of those territories, especially as regards freedom of employment choice, freedom of expression, freedom of movement, and freedom of association."

Therefore, temporary measures to improve the conditions of the Palestinian workers are not likely to lead to any significant change in the status of the Palestinian population unless and until the occupation of their territories is ended.

I would like to take this opportunity to express Pakistan's total and abiding support for the struggle of the people of Palestine, under the leadership of the PLO, their sole legitimate representative, to establish a state on their own homeland. We strongly feel that for any peace initiative to succeed, it must address the core issue of foreign domination. In our view, an end to the occupation of the occupied territories will create the favourable conditions for the peace and security necessary to all to improve the condition of the workers.

Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – I should like, on behalf of my delegation, to express our profound gratitude and deep appreciation to the President for convening this special session on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem. The convening of this session is very timely since the situation in the territories continues to be of grave concern as a result of the persistence of Israel, the occupying power, in its policies and practices in the occupied Arab territories.

Israel continues to violate its legal obligations under the IVth Geneva Convention of 1949 to which it is a consignatory and has escalated its brutal repression against the peoples of the occupied territories, especially the Palestinian people. The Israeli occupying power has imposed collective punishment, long curfews, arrests and detentions, roadblocks, closure of the occupied territories and the deportation of Palestinians, all of which have resulted in grave economic hardship and the destruction of the economic infrastructure of the peoples under occupation, in particular the Palestinians.

Of particularly grave concern is the declared position of the Government of Israel and its persistence in implementing its policies and practices in Jerusalem, by continuing to establish more Jewish settlements and imposing high taxation on Palestinian inhabitants which in turn has disastrous consequences on the living conditions of the local population.

Allow me to take this opportunity to commend the Director-General of the ILO and his collaborators for their valuable job in preparing and presenting the Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories at this year's session of the International Labour Conference, which is the 16th report on the subject.

As has been clearly described in the Report, "... a state of Israeli military occupation renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain fundamental standards and principles that have been developed by the International Labour Office are to be fully respected". In this context, we remain confident that it is within the competence of the ILO, and its duty, to take necessary and immediate steps with a view to restoring, promoting and protecting those rights.

Moreover, to ensure that those rights and protection are fully restored and respected, the world community must strongly deplore Israeli military occupation policies and practices, since they constitute flagrant violations of United Nations Security Council Resolutions 252, 465, 478 and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly, and therefore those occupation policies and practices must be considered null and void.

In the final analysis, resolving the overall problem affecting the whole region, in particular with regard to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, lies in a just and comprehensive solution to the conflict.

We are of the firm conviction that such a peaceful solution can be achieved only if it is based on Israel's withdrawal from all occupied Arab and Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem and if it guarantees the full exercise by the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights.

Original Arabic: Mr. KCHAOU (Government delegate, Tunisia) – I would like to take the floor to speak on behalf of the Government delegations of States belonging to the Arab Maghreb Union and make a contribution to this special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories and Palestine.

The special sitting is being convened at a time when the international community is seeing signs of radical changes in international relations, based on legality, democracy and respect for human rights. However, the Palestinian people are still living under occupation, their human rights are being violated, in particular the most fundamental of human rights, including the right to life, to own land and to live in one's homeland. The situation regarding employment for workers in Palestine and in the other occupied territories is deteriorating day by day.

There is no need for me to tell you more about the violations of the human rights of the Palestinian people and of their daily suffering. They are difficult to list here and take differing forms. A few examples have been given in the Report of the Director-General and in the statements of the Palestinian delegate and the Minister of the Syrian Arab Republic, Mr. Khalil, who spoke on behalf of the Arab Group. I would prefer, in the short time available to me to talk about the ILO's role in this sphere. The ILO is the social conscience of the world and is about to celebrate its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In paragraph 148 of his Report, the Director-General states, as he did last year, that "a state of military occupation renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain fundamental standards and principles that have been developed by the International Labour Organization are to be fully respected". We fully endorse this point of view. We therefore believe that to end the suffering of the Palestinian people we must end the Israeli occupation and restore all rights to the heroic people of Palestine, including the right to self-determination and the establishment of an independent State. For this reason we in the Arab Maghreb Union are following closely the peace negotiations currently under way and hope that they will end in success as soon as possible and lead to long-lasting peace in the region – this of course can only be achieved through a just solution to the Palestinian question based on international legitimacy.

However whilst awaiting this solution, the ILO will have to do everything possible in its sphere of competence to relieve the suffering of workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. Undoubtedly certain achievements have been made, and I welcome this fourth special sitting and the annual Report of the Director-General (we are currently examining the 16th such Report). We would like to thank the International Labour Office and Mr Michel Hansenne for all they have done and for all their efforts. However, with regard to technical cooperation which is still qualitatively and quantitatively limited, we are still far from achieving our ambitions, meeting the needs of the workers, and from the objectives laid down 13 years ago, in 1980, by the session of the Conference "to provide all types of assistance and support to Arab citizens in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories to strengthen their economic and technical capabilities and to counteract the effects of the Israeli occupation and settlement policy".

We hope that a technical cooperation programme will be drawn up and implemented in order to improve the living and working conditions of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, as mentioned in paragraph 161 of the Director-General's Report. We hope that an administrative branch of the ILO will be given the task of drawing up such programmes and implementing them. We also hope that a representative of the ILO will be appointed in the occupied Arab territories to liaise with all the beneficiaries of this kind of programme. We welcome the ILO's desire, as expressed by the Director-General, to harmonize and increase its technical cooperation programmes in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

To enable the Conference to discuss efficiently and seriously the Director-General's annual Report and to ensure the success of the ILO's activities and programmes on behalf of Palestinian workers, a permanent mechanism needs to be established. The most appropriate mechanism would be a committee of the Conference. There are many arguments justifying the establishment of this kind of committee, including: the absence of legal obstacles preventing its establishment. On the contrary, as a general rule, committees of the Conference are set up to study issues brought before the Conference in accordance with Article 8 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. This committee would embody the principle of tripartism on which the work of our Organization is based and would help encourage real dialogue and an exchange of opinions leading to conclusions with greater effect than those reached at the special sitting which is limited to a series of statements. The establishment of a committee has already been requested over the years by many delegates, and at various levels, suggested to the Governing Body during special sittings, such as the fourth Conference of Ministers of Labour of the Non-Aligned and other Developing Countries which was held in 1990 in Tunisia. Finally, the establishment of this committee would be in accordance with the planned amendment to the Conference. The establishment of a committee whose composition and number of members would resemble that of the Committee on Apartheid would help us to save time and money as meetings would be held at the same time as those of other committees.

The establishment of this committee is not simply a goal in itself. It is an efficient and appropriate way for the International Labour Organization to carry out its tasks and meet its responsibilities with regard to workers and the Palestinian people. This is an obligation which cannot be challenged. If you want the Conference seriously to be able to deal with these problems, the International Labour Office will have to take the initiative with regard to setting up this committee, which will prove how successful the fourth special sitting has been. We are convinced that the Organization will heed this request, in accordance with the noble objectives the realization of which constitute its raison d'être and inspire its activities.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – I should like to thank the Director-General of the ILO on behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates for having sent a fact-finding mission to investigate the situation of workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. I would also like to express our appreciation and gratitude for the work of the ILO mission this year. The report of the mission was detailed, objective and impartial. It is commensurate with the prominent position and prestigious reputation of the ILO.

The mission's Report this year shows a deterioration in the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. It confirms the basic truth that conditions cannot be improved under occupation. The Report emphasizes the dangers associated with the absence of national institutions and hence the lack of a real national authority capable of determining options and planning economic and social development.

The motives of the Israeli administration, as may be gathered from the Report, are necessarily at variance with Palestinian and Arab interests. This in itself helps to account for various practices and abuses and for the adverse effects of the continuing military occupation of the Arab territories.

This is the fourth time that the International Labour Conference has held a special sitting to discuss an appendix to the Report of the Director-General concerning the situation of workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. Over the past three years the special sitting has enabled delegations participating in the Conference to state clearly their positions, observations and proposals regarding the contents of the Report, the work of the annual ILO mission and the failure of the occupation authorities to comply with the mission's recommendations. This sitting has also brought to light the conditions in which the people of the occupied territories are living. Perhaps the main basic fact brought out by the reports of the ILO's annual mission and confirmed by this special sitting of the Conference is that the living conditions and the social, economic and humanitarian situation of the workers and people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories have worsened. At the same time, the occupation authorities continue their practices and international representations are incapable of putting an end to them.

This being the case, the delegation of my country feels that the work of this special sitting, in spite of its importance, is no longer sufficient to deal with the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. No action is taken on the deliberations of the sitting. No conclusions are drawn and there is no monitoring of follow-up to its practical proposals and recommendations. Our delegation would therefore like to propose setting up a special committee in the framework of the International Labour Conference to study the appendix to the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories and to submit recommendations and proposals thereon.

In putting forward the idea of setting up a committee, we should like to make it clear that the main purpose of this initiative is to help the Conference to discuss the Director-General's Report in greater depth through real dialogue, serious debate and constructive exchanges of views and ideas among representatives of governments, employers and workers within the proposed smaller committee. The work of the committee would also allow participants in the Conference to follow up the recommendations of the annual ILO mission to the occupied Arab territories in a more regular and precise way.

The establishment of such a committee would be a practical contribution on the part of the ILO to international efforts to find a just and lasting solution to the Palestinian question and the problem of the Middle East. The present situations of the people of the occupied territories demands that the ILO provide additional assistance to workers and employers living in the territories through technical cooperation programmes.

At the 54th session of the Board of the ILO's International Training Centre in Turin (Italy) in May, our delegation called for the preparation of special training programmes for the people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We would like to reiterate the proposal in this forum and we call on the ILO to give high priority to projects and programmes of technical cooperation for the people of the occupied Arab territories, to draw up regular programmes on their behalf and to seek appropriate funding for these programmes under the Organization's regular programme and from other sources of technical cooperation funding, for example international and regional organizations and States that traditionally finance technical cooperation projects.

Original French: Mr. TRAORE (Government delegate, Mali) – In speaking for the first time before this august assembly I should like to congratulate the President on his unanimous election.

I should also like to congratulate the other Officers for the confidence placed in them by the Conference. The Mali delegation is very pleased that a special session has been devoted to the examination of Appendix II of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

The report, which is based on the mission carried out by the Office in this region of the world, has highlighted the extremely preoccupying situation which prevails there. Efforts have certainly been made here and there, but a great deal remains to be done.

My country, which is firmly attached to the ideals of peace and social justice, the fundamental principles of the ILO, considers that these objectives will never be achieved unless minimum standards of the Organization are respected and maintained.

This is why the delegation of Mali endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the Director-General's Report.

In this context we would like to invite all participants concerned to explore the ways and means offered by our Organization to help improve the conditions of life and work of the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

The delegation of my country believes that the ILO can and must play an active role in ensuring that greater account is taken in the future of the problems of the workers concerned.

In conclusion, I would like to express the wish that the conclusions of this session will meet all our expectations.

Original Arabic: Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to chair this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and wish him every success in his work on the important issues on our agenda.

In previous years when I have taken the floor to discuss an item on the agenda, I have stressed more than once that in order to combat malaria it is not enough to attack the mosquitoes – the swamp must be drained. In other words, a problem must be solved at its roots, and we must not be satisfied with dealing just with surface issues.

Since the last session of the Conference, there have been elections in Israel and the new Government headed by parties belonging to the Israeli labour movement has taken office. Two central issues dominate this Government's actions. Firstly, a continuing quest for peace and the prompt re-opening of the peace talks and, secondly, a change in the national order of priorities both in social and in political spheres.

In the political sphere, the new Labour Government has launched a renewal of the peace process with Israel's neighbours. The guiding principles of this process are that it is necessary to end the situation of domination by one people over another, and achieve peaceful coexistence. In the social sector, the distribution of the state budget has been radically changed and the money which in the past was spent on the development of political settlements in the territories is now channelled towards the development of an infrastructure, and solving unemployment problems and other social issues. Histadrut, the General Federation of Labour in Israel, has needless to say expressed its total support for this new order of priorities.

And so, the peace talks have been resumed, and despite all the ups and downs typical of such a process, they have already gone beyond procedural matters, and are discussing issues of substance. However, as the talks progressed in a positive way, resistance on the part of the other side developed. Fundamentalist and other rejectionist factors started a vicious war of terror, targeted against both Israelis and their Arab brothers, scores of people were stabbed and shot to death. The Israeli Government was convinced that, if this lack of personal security were to continue, internal unrest would escalate, endangering the entire peace process. So, the Government decided, as a first stage, to temporarily deport the heads of the fundamentalist camp, who were at the spearhead of the terrorist activities. Secondly, it was decided to close the crossing points between Israel and the territories, and thus prevent the population of the territories from whose ranks came those who attacked their co-workers and employers from arriving at their workplaces in Israel.

Nevertheless, in the meantime, in response to the demands made by Histadrut, the entry of workers from the territories, mostly building and agricultural workers, has been allowed. Their number is planned to reach 50,000 to 60,000, approaching the number of registered workers before the closure. One positive result has been that unregistered work has practically ceased, with all that this implies concerning the safeguarding of workers' rights.

I do not deny the fact that there is a political debate in Israel about these measures. But it is also impossible to ignore the fact that as a result of these measures, personal terror within Israel's boundaries has almost ceased. An immediate problem of unemployment in the territories has been created, but at the same time an important target was achieved – the beginning of a gradual separation between the two peoples, which the Palestinian side will no doubt approve of.

The new situation requires adapting to a new reality. Histadrut, the General Federation of Labour in Israel, has placed two basic demands before the Israeli Government:

- Since the closure was sudden, it is necessary to find alternative places of work for the workers from the territories who have lost their jobs in Israel. Some should be given vocational training, both for men and women, which will equip them for the new situation when self-rule is established, and there are also those who will not be able to find employment for themselves, whose livelihood will have to be ensured during the whole period of their unemployment.
- In order to create new jobs, considerable sums of money will have to be diverted towards the construction of an employment infrastructure in the territories themselves. The Israeli Government has decided to increase significantly investment in the territories from 120 million shekels last year to 450 million shekels this year, and out of this sum, 140 million shekels are being invested immediately in relief work and infrastructure projects.

The Histadrut has made its own modest contribution by pledging financial support for a project on vocational training, safety and hygiene and the establishment of a Polytechnic school in Gaza.

Since the restricted resources of Israel are not sufficient, Histadrut has also approached the ICFTU and calls upon the countries to whom the peace of the world is dear, and especially to the Arab States, whose brothers' welfare should be dear to them, to come and invest in the territories, to develop them, and help to create new sources of employment.

The Histadrut has also played its part. In addition to the trade union protection it provides to the workers from the territories, and to all workers in Israel, it operates a special Committee for Workers from the territories, of which I have the honour to be Chairman. This Committee continues to inform the workers of their rights, both by means of seminars for the workers from the territories and for the workers of the Payments Division of the Employment Service, whose function includes stringent care, or through different publications. These offices were favourably received. In conclusion, distinguished delegates, members of the Arab Governments:

Let's pave the sun a way
The morning must be bright
Because even the purest prayer,
Won't return us the light.

The Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO says that the continuation of conflicts endangers peace as a whole, and unless peace is restored, social injustice will continue, and the peace of the region will be at risk.

To my dear Palestinian brothers I say that until now the continuation of the conflict has prevented you from controlling your destiny; until now the continuation of the conflict has brought death, anguish, economic backwardness and poverty. Please take advantage of the great opportunity that has opened now and take it immediately, since this opportunity is not for eternity. Come and discuss with the State of Israel, on the basis of mutual compromise, a just settlement for the welfare of the masses of your workers and please "Raise your eyes with hope, not through aiming sights." This saying is a song for peace.

Original Arabic: Mr. ZAHRAN (Government delegate, Egypt) – Since 1978 we have customarily received a report by the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The deterioration of their situation is linked to the continuation of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and of Syrian territory for more than a quarter of a century.

The continuation of the occupation of these territories and of southern Lebanon has led to the destruction of the economic infrastructure of Palestine. Convention No. 111 is still being violated. It deals with the need to eliminate all forms of discrimination in employment. Security and military measures are continuing to be inflicted in all walks of life on the Palestinian people, especially when it comes to freedom of association and freedom of expression. The continuing violence and the expansion of settlements have increased still further the adverse effects of these policies on the Arab inhabitants. Education, medical care and employment, which are provided free of charge to the new settlers, are given at the expense of the Arab inhabitants and their legitimate rights. The international community has condemned the establishment of Israeli settlements in the occupied Arab territories. Social and economic norms are applied using a double standard, and this is increasing the tension in the area. Therefore, we must put an end to the policy of establishing settlements in the occupied Arab territories.

On the basis of the noble aims of the ILO enshrined in its Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia, the international labour standards and ILO Conference resolutions, and especially the resolutions adopted in 1974 and 1980 on the Palestinian question, this Organization and others should assume their full responsibilities and carry out their duties by providing protection to the Palestinian people and provide them with technical, social, economic and humanitarian assistance and increase the allocations in the budget of the Organization for workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories.

In this way, the Palestinian people may find anew their rights, increase employment opportunities and possibly eliminate unemployment. We have noticed while studying the Report of the Director-General that the situation of Arab workers has not improved, and that the recommendations of previous reports have not been followed. We are committed to the principle of equality and equal opportunities for the Palestinian workers, and to providing employment and social security for them. Employers and production establishments should be allowed to set up their own associations in order to safeguard their rights, increase job opportunities and in the long run to eliminate unemployment. We would like to emphasize here that the International Labour Organization should more than ever follow up and implement the recommendations contained in the Report of the Director-General so that they do not remain a dead letter.

The special sitting in which we are meeting today in order to discuss the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories is not an aim in itself. In fact, we are hoping that the Report of the Director-General on the special sitting will contain specific conclusions and that it will reflect our proposals and recommendations.

I am quite confident that the rights of Arab workers will be respected when the Israeli occupation is ended in all the occupied Arab territories and when the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination is recognized in accordance with Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and with the principle of exchanging land for peace. In this way the region as a whole may enjoy a just, lasting and comprehensive peace through the bilateral and multilateral peace negotiations which started in Madrid and which, we hope, will be crowned with success as quickly as possible.

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Secretary of Labor and Employment, Philippines) – May we extend our full appreciation to the Director-General for the excellent report that has been prepared on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, particularly on the extent to which action has been taken by the authorities to give effect to recommendations made in the earlier reports of the Director-General.

Our delegation declares its unqualified support for the proposition stated in the Constitution of the ILO that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice" – a basic human right to which all workers of the world, including those in the occupied territories, are equally entitled.

Our delegation welcomes the fact that the Director-General's representatives were granted access to representatives of the authorities and various eminent persons and organizations – both Israeli and Palestinian.

We agree that the ILO can make a positive contribution to the general process of seeking solutions to the region's social and economic problems and, in so doing, contribute immensely to the successful conclusion of the peace process started in 1991.

May we commend the Office, and the Organization as well, not only for the missions that have resulted in the analysis we have before us today, but also for the various projects it has undertaken in the region. As the report has pointed out, such initiatives by the ILO as well as by individual member States have contributed, not only to improvements in the well-being of the workers of this region, but also to the search for workable solutions to the problems at the political level that affect the territories.

We consider the positive signs of progress as stated in the Report – including the concrete efforts to increase investment and create employment in the territories – as examples of contributions that can be made toward the achievement of better conditions for workers in this part of the world.

We support the recommendation that, as long as the state of occupation remains in existence, extraordinary steps must be taken to alleviate the constraints upon the workers, particularly the onerous working conditions and living conditions. Effective action must be taken to ensure that the tensions that have existed for so long in the area are not aggravated.

The employment situation in the territories – assuming that peace and stability will prevail – requires special attention and specific interventions. These interventions, the report points out, include the extent to which Palestinian workers continue to find work in other countries, the amount of money invested in the local economy and the nature of such investments. Steps must be taken to lighten the severe economic burden of the workers.

We acknowledge that the measures adopted by the Civil Administration to promote investments and employment in the area have had some effect. But, as the report observes, more is needed quickly to prevent the employment situation from deteriorating even further. Employment policy options and the consequent generation of employment opportunities must be given priority.

Special measures and resources for promoting self-employment and labour-intensive public works programmes and the training of workers will need to be put in place to guarantee the success of interventions made by the ILO and individual nations.

Our delegation hopes that the authorities and Civil Administration will continue in this direction by adopting and accelerating the implementation of such measures to provide wider social protection for the workers of this region.

Moreover, in line with the main topics we are considering in this year's Conference, we also would like to endorse the recommendations made by the mission regarding trade unionism and national insurance. Furthermore, the Philippines supports and encourages the ILO's action and programme of technical cooperation.

We note with satisfaction that the report on technical cooperation states that ILO collaboration with UNDP since 1980 has always been efficient and productive. The current ILO projects on trade union training, the training of employers and the vocational rehabilitation of the handicapped are, to us, particularly relevant to the present needs of workers of the territories. It also mentions that, despite the difficulties, the ILO has managed to move forward in the implementation of its programmes in favour of trade unionism through technical cooperation. Training courses for trade union instructors conducted within the territories themselves and the action plan drawn up to help employers in the region are the kind of concrete action that the ILO should continue to pursue. The Philippines fully subscribes to these activities of the ILO.

Our delegation supports the initiatives taken by the ILO to facilitate discussions between the trade unions of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the Israeli General Federation of Trade Unions. However, as pointed out in the report, no response had been made to the 1992 recommendation to consider a mechanism to enable the parties to seek solutions to social and labour problems evoked in the report. We also endorse the ILO's offer of its good offices to all parties involved and hope that full advantage will be taken of the facilities available in the ILO to reach a solution.

With the Director-General, we express the hope that the setbacks of the peace process may be overcome. This would result in the much-awaited political stability and peace – conditions essential to the promotion of social justice and economic advancements of workers in these territories.

In the discussion of the first two volumes of the Director-General's Report, we talked about the need to muster extraordinary political will and energy to win the future, not only for ourselves, but also for the generations to come. We can only win the future if peace in all areas, including the region we speak of at this Special Sitting, can be achieved. The world is too small; and the futures of our individual nations are all bound up with each other.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – On behalf of both the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself, it is my great privilege to congratulate Mr Abdel-Hak on his election. I hope that under his able leadership this session of the Conference will have a positive conclusion.

May I also take this opportunity to convey our deep appreciation of the report submitted by the Director-General on the issue relating to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. We appreciate the report and its findings and also commend the work of the members of the team who have visited the occupied territories.

I would also like to take the opportunity to convey our sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election. We hope that the work which is being done by the ILO in various fields, and particularly on the issue at hand, will be most seriously pursued, and that technical cooperation will be increased for the workers living in the occupied Arab territories, since they are suffering both socially and economically as the report has once again spotlighted.

I would like to mention a few aspects which have been pointed out in the report. With regard to social security the report clearly spotlights that the Arab workers are subjected to discrimination. Paragraph 89 says that the problem of entitlement to the benefits corresponding to the deductions made from their wages remains a major problem in the pursuit of fairness and social justice for these workers. It describes the situation which has caused a deep sense of injustice among the Palestinians, but is justified by the Israelis as a strict application of the social system. It concludes that the system is obviously not applicable in the light of ILO standards. The report states that when taxes are included, the deductions made from the Palestinian workers' wages come to around 40 per cent. The ILO points out that this serious matter gives rise to a deep sense of injustice and frustration and therefore its conclusion and recommendation, in paragraph 157, calls for the elimination of this discrimination against the Palestinian workers.

Similarly, on the settlement issue the report once again reiterates that this issue has been affecting the employment, socio-economic, working and living conditions of the Palestinian workers, and they have become foreigners in their own land by virtue of the continuous build-up of settlements in the occupied Arab territories.

This is not only in violation of United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 446 (1980) and the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1980. The report also refers to the country report on human rights practices for 1992 of the United States Department of State in paragraph 125 and says that the "discriminatory situation is compounded by the expansion of the settlements and the growth of the Israeli population in the occupied territories". Discrimination particularly affects the residency rights, the freedom of movement, and the access to health and social services of Palestinian workers.

In paragraph 159 the report states that the settlements have constantly been denounced by the international community as leading to inequalities and tension in the area. We fully support these observations and request that these settlements be dismantled in accordance with the United Nations Security Council resolution as this situation is not only endangering the peace, but also affects the employment, other working and living conditions of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories.

In paragraph 109, the report once again spotlights how trade union rights are being flagrantly violated. It says that "trade unions are still considered as fronts for terrorist activity and are treated as such by the occupying military administration". It is only, however, through a radical change of attitude on the part of the military toward the unions that any progress will be made in this situation. In paragraph 148 the report says "it can only be repeated that a state of military occupation renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential (...) The massive military presence (...) and the huge array of military rules (...) that govern practically every aspect of the daily lives of the population of these territories, all place very severe restrictions on the workers of these territories, especially as regards freedom of employment choice, freedom of expression, freedom of movement and freedom of association".

These assertions reaffirm the state of suffering of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories. We in Pakistan fully support these observations and we strongly urge all freedom-loving people around the world to help end the aggression and occupation of the occupied Arab territories so the workers living in them have a sense of independence and freedom because no worker under foreign occupation can enjoy his political and civil rights. As has been previously stated by this Conference, all human beings irrespective, of race, creed or sex, have the right to live in freedom and dignity. We therefore encourage all freedom-loving nations to work towards peace so that the people in the occupied Arab territories can enjoy the right to independence and be free from their suffering. We fully support the ILO's initiative to increase its technical cooperation in this area.

Mr. BOATENG (Minister of Employment and Social Welfare, Ghana) – I would like, on behalf of the Ghana delegation, once more to congratulate the Director-General for his objective and dispassionate Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The Report paints a very grim and disquieting picture which does not augur well for peace and stability in the subregion after many years of wars, destruction and agony.

The Government and people of Ghana are therefore happy at the resumption of peace initiatives between the Arab nations and Israel.

We recognize the deep suspicion, contradictions and reservations that surround many of the issues under negotiation.

We are, none the less, gratified to note that despite the differences and polarized positions of the opposing parties, the ILO delegation which visited the Middle East saw a genuine desire, goodwill and preparedness among the parties to talk, variables which are so vital for human existence and development.

My delegation would like to commend the contending factions in the Middle East conflict for their maturity, tolerance and determination to seek a peaceful and lasting solution to the explosive situation in the occupied Arab territories.

The emerging pattern of development in the world today, in spite of the prevalence of civil wars and chaos in many countries, is one of conscious effort to seek unity, understanding and solidarity among governments and peoples, as can be seen from the economic integration of Europe, the Americas and Asia.

I sincerely believe that no group of persons or nations can easily wish away these positive developments towards unity, peace and freedom in the world. My delegation would therefore like to urge the parties involved in the Palestinian conflict to take advantage of the current socio-economic developments in a global unipolar environment to pursue the path of dialogue and flexibility in negotiations in order to achieve a peaceful and lasting settlement of their crisis.

In conclusion, we sincerely hope that the ILO and the United Nations will continue to persevere in their efforts to facilitate all initiatives that will finally end this intractable problem in exchange for mutual understanding and co-existence in the occupied Arab territories.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – As was the case last year, it is my honour to speak in this debate not merely as employers' delegate of France, but as Chairman of the Employers' group and President of Organization of Employers, which includes members from more than 100 countries, and in particular from the countries in the region under discussion.

On their behalf, I would like to issue a message of hope and solidarity.

First, a message of hope. Notwithstanding the difficulties encountered and which were to be expected, the efforts made by political leaders to put an end to this long conflict continue and allow us to hope that a lasting peace will be established. It is obvious that only peace will permit the peoples of the occupied Arab territories to enjoy the normal conditions required for economic development and social progress. We cannot therefore remain indifferent to this great hope of peace which springs in this part of the world and we assure those who are living and suffering of our deep sympathy in this crucial moment of their history and that we share their hope.

Secondly, a message of solidarity. It is not too early to begin thinking of reconstruction. Enterprises need peace to carry out their economic function. But they will need more and more, during the development of the peace process, to modernize their management techniques, to set up a system of occupational relations and to play their role in the world economy.

In this connection, we have noted with satisfaction the mission carried out by an ILO official to employers' organizations, essentially Chambers of Commerce. As paragraph 107 on page 42 states, these Chambers of Commerce are now run by elected teams, "and it would now appear that they are beginning to emerge as institutions which truly intend to represent the interests of commerce, industry and agriculture in their respective areas".

We must take this opportunity to strengthen the dynamism of these organizations and with this objective in mind, to continue to prepare the organization of a seminar for their needs as soon as possible.

Heads of enterprises ought to be given attention by the ILO as are other social categories, because they are the driving force behind development.

We shall continue to follow with deep emotion the positive development of dialogue amongst all parties concerned, and hope that future events will confirm and justify our optimism.

Original Arabic: Mr. DHIFALLI (Workers' adviser, Tunisia) – The content of the mission's report fills us with concern and disgust at the tragic situation of the workers and people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories due to continued Israeli military occupation, persistent violations of human rights and basic and trade union freedoms, policies of discrimination, imprisonment and house arrest, expulsion and deportation, confiscation of land and building of settlements, the imposition of oppressive taxes and the promulgation of innumerable laws and regulations restricting freedom of movement and trade union activities. As though that were not enough, the military occupation authorities have now isolated the West Bank and the Gaza Strip from the rest of the world, inflicting heavy financial losses, destroying the fledgling Palestinian economy, halting work and increasing unemployment.

The reasons for the sufferings of the Arab people in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories are set forth in the introduction to the Report of the Director-General, which states in paragraph 5 that "the continuing state of occupation… of the West Bank (including East Jerusalem), the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights rendered impossible a situation in which the standards and principles enunciated in ILO instruments could be fully respected". This paragraph sums up clearly the reasons for the sufferings of the Arab people living under occupation and the destructive consequences of that occupation, in particular: the deteriorating economic situation, with low standards of living and terribly high unemployment rates, reaching in some cases 40 per cent of the workforce; continued confiscation of land, control of water resources, persistent expansion of settlements and encouragement of immigration with a view to changing the composition of the population (the amount of land confiscated in the period 1967-92 came to 3,059,874 dunums); a continuous policy of discrimination and inequality in the treatment of Palestinian workers together with major deductions from wages and direct and indirect Israeli taxes on Palestinian workers; persistent violations of trade union rights and freedoms, demolition of headquarters of the Palestinian trade union federation, a ban on travel and restrictions on the freedom of movement of trade unionists, restrictions on Arab employers and companies and oppressive taxation; the policy of collective deportation, most recently that of 418 Palestinians from different walks of life (engineers, doctors, students, workers and businessmen) who are still living in Marj al-Zuhur in spite of the adoption of Security Council resolution 799 demanding their return; persistent Israeli action against educational, health and religious institutions and attempts to obliterate cultural and national identities and bring about geographic and demographic changes in the occupied territories.

Those were just a few examples of the most flagrant Israeli policies, all of them contrary to international legal instruments and United Nations resolutions. They are condemned and deplored by all democratic and peace-loving forces. Under these circumstances, considering that the International Labour Organization is the social conscience of the world and has an international responsibility to defend the rights of workers and employers in accordance with the international labour standards that it has established, we invite this session of the Conference to take the following steps:

(1) call on the Israeli Government to respect human rights and basic freedoms, including trade union rights and freedoms, to halt its policies of discrimination, confiscation of land, settlement building, deportation and expulsion, imprisonment and detention, and to respect the cultural and national identity of the Palestinian and Syrian peoples;

(2) set up a special committee of this Conference to replace the special sitting, under the auspices of the International Labour Conference, as a more effective means of devising specific mechanisms aimed at ending the economic, social and political oppression of the workers and people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories by the Israeli authorities;

(3) appoint an ILO resident representative to monitor the situation of Arab workers and employers and provide them with greater protection and to follow up technical cooperation activities more efficiently;

(4) invite the International Labour Office and the Governing Body to prepare integrated technical cooperation programmes corresponding to the needs of the social partners in the occupied Arab territories;

(5) invite the International Labour Office to prepare a multidisciplinary, economic, social and labour-oriented study to establish the needs and requirements of the next stage of support for development of the infrastructure of Palestinian institutions.

Condemnation of Israeli occupation policies and oppressive practices in all international forums has not prevented the Israeli Government from pressing ahead with these reckless policies. The international community must therefore set up new alternative mechanisms designed to force the Israeli occupation authorities to withdraw from Palestine and the occupied Arab territories and establish a just, lasting and comprehensive peace as the cornerstone of the process of economic and social construction and development and of security and stability in the region and the world as a whole.

Lastly, we wish to pay tribute to the steadfastness of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, to the courageous popular intifada and to the revolution of the stone-throwing children who are fighting against occupation and for freedom and independence. In conclusion, I thank the Director-General for preparing this report that has shed light on the sufferings of the workers and people of Palestine.

May God's peace and mercy be with you.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – The Director-General's 16th Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories is based on information gathered and observations made by his representatives during their missions to Israel and the occupied Arab territories. It brings up to date the information given and observations that have been made every year since 1978.

This excellent Report is both authoritative and impartial. What is alarming is the failure of the Israeli authorities to implement the recommendations made from year to year. The military occupation described in paragraph 148 of the report renders impossible the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain fundamental ILO standards and principles are to be fully respected.

This fact, together with the action of closing off the territories, exploitation of workers without work permits by hiring them at low wages, negative effects on wages and the calculation of benefits of the workers on a daily contract basis, and the harsh conditions to which workers in the Gaza Strip are exposed would seem to indicate that a concerted effort by the Government and civil administration could lead to effective action to make improvements in the situation of workers of the occupied territories.

The ILO will have to play a positive role and make efforts to improve the working and living conditions of Palestinian workers by an accelerated programme of technical cooperation. The strengthening of employer organizations, which has been recommended by a recent ILO mission to the occupied Arab territories, is of the utmost importance for the creation of new employment opportunities within the occupied territories.

For the past week we have been discussing social security and social protection, which are so essential for workers in a modern society. Let us hope this message will, in spite of all the restrictions and oppression, permeate through to the occupied Arab territories also, where workers are denied social security benefits and are subject to discrimination. As the Report admits, a Palestinian worker does not receive all the benefits that should accrue individually and directly from the social insurance contributions that are automatically deducted from his wages.

We sincerely hope that the appeals of the international community and the specific proposals of cooperation made by the ILO, duly endorsed by the Conference, will bring about an improvement of the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original French: Mr. SENE (Government delegate, Senegal) – The Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, i.e. the West Bank including East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip and the Syrian Golan Heights, includes new information this year on the one hand as a result of the security measures taken by Israel itself by closing its borders, and on the other hand because of the climate concerning expectation surrounding the negotiations going on between Israelis, Arabs and Palestinians.

In this connection, the Report reflects the importance we must attach to the action of the ILO on behalf of workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories in order to guarantee better protection of the inhabitants pursuant to international law, and in particular the 1949 Geneva Convention to which Israel is signatory, as well as the Hague Convention of 1907.

Clearly the Report draws its strength above all from the principles and objectives laid down in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, specifically as regards non-discrimination, industrial relations, social protection and freedom of association as the indispensable conditions which would improve the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

The Report obviously paints a bleak picture of continued tension and violence, distressing security problems and the constraints imposed by the military authorities, such as expulsion and administrative detention. All of these are factors with serious repercussions on the economic and social situation, or in short, on the lives of the territories' workers.

The Report emphasizes that since the beginning of 1993 there has been a clear upsurge in the violence, which has claimed many victims, including Palestinian children.

And yet the peace negotiations begun in Madrid in October 1991 and continuing in Washington have kindled hope and given a new impetus to the legitimate aspiration of the Palestinian people to exercise its right to self-determination.

In this light, the Report underlines that the Israelis, the Palestinians and the Arabs are being cautious and do not want to compromise the negotiations while seeking a genuine Middle East peace based on a just equitable and lasting settlement of the Palestinian question. The President's country, Egypt, a land of age-old African civilization, has already set the example by establishing peaceful relations with Israel, and this with the support of the African countries.

However, the closure of the borders, which prohibits 100,000 residents of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank from going to work every day is, without any doubt, a regrettable impediment which seriously diminishes the living conditions of workers in the occupied territories.

According to the Report, this new situation gives rise to hardships for Palestinian labour, which loses some 2.5 million United States dollars every day. Nevertheless, my delegation considers that the main issue to be given the greatest priority and urgency and the irreplaceable sine qua non is the achievement of peace and stability, to create an environment conducive to trust, employment and investment in these territories.

In the meantime, closing the borders merely fans the flames of hatred and mistrust, fuelling extremists and aggressiveness, the use of brute force and repression, and as the Report notes, worsening the tension in these territories and aggravating the ill will of the Arab and Israeli populations.

The Report also mentions the contacts made by the ILO and Chambers of Commerce of the occupied territories to take action against certain arbitrary and discriminatory practices, such as the use of middlemen for the import or export of goods as well as bureaucratic obstacles and abusive taxation imposed by the occupying power.

As regards the situation in the Syrian territory of the Golan Heights, notwithstanding its unilateral annexation in 1981, which the Security Council declared null and void, the Report recalls the fact that the Arab populations living there have always rejected and resisted the occupation and have always opposed the confiscation of land, the establishment of settlements, and alienation from their culture.

In short, the Report's analysis of the effects of the settlements and their extension on the life of workers in the occupied Arab territories deserves to be developed more comprehensively from a number of angles.

On the other hand, my delegation accepts the recommendation to the occupying authorities to set up true trade unions in the occupied territories.

Toward this end, the Report suggests that the Israeli general federation of trade unions, the Histadrut, could contribute by initiating a dialogue with the Arab and Palestinian workers to seek solutions to the problems which their respective societies must face.

In our opinion, productive forces and social and occupational groups should have a say in the search for a peaceful solution to the Middle East crisis which, as we all know, is one of the most dangerous crises facing the world today.

In conclusion, my delegation shares the views of the Report. The ILO, under its mandate, must place its wealth of experience and its operational and assistance capacities at the service of all the parties by offering, as necessary, its good offices to improve the conditions for social dialogue.

In other words, the ILO in its field of competence should do everything possible to create a favourable climate for the promotion of social justice, the establishment of peace and the economic development of the occupied Arab territories.

Lastly, the ILO in its standard-setting and technical cooperation activities, based on tripartism, must help the men, women and children in this region during this critical phase of worldwide transition to build jointly societies which respect the principles of law, of fundamental freedoms, of a spirit of tolerance and peaceful coexistence for the sake of the wealth, well-being and future of the entire Middle East, that cradle of great cultures which became universally acknowledged as a breeding ground for the human spirit.

Original German: Mr. KLEIN (Government delegate, Austria) – This year, the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied territories is particularly informative. Using the example of a particular population group, it illustrates the far-reaching consequences of the violence, insecurity and injustice which have lasted for more than a quarter of a century.

The Director-General's Report is, however, also the product of cooperation between the competent Israeli authorities and the ILO mission. We therefore regard it as a sign that goodwill does exist.

It is generally accepted that the military occupation renders the full observance of ILO principles difficult, if not impossible. Nevertheless, we urge the competent authorities to improve the lot of the working population in the occupied Arab territories.

The degrading treatment experienced by many workers at checkpoints, and the denial of access to workplaces in Israel which has been going on for several weeks, make it very difficult to find a solution to the political contention between the Arab and Jewish population, and constitute a recipe for new suffering and embitterment.

The system of day-labour, which many workers are obliged to accept, the inadequate social benefits and the restrictions in freedom of assembly often prevent the people concerned from exercising their legitimate rights in the social sphere. For that reason, Austria has spoken up on many occasions for a dialogue between Arab and Israeli trade unions.

I would like to recall at this point that last year, significant steps were taken to improve the situation of the Palestinian people in the work sphere. We also welcome the new opportunities for job creation and new protective measures for workers. But these efforts cannot, with the best will in the world, be described as anywhere near adequate. Above all, the continuing policy of settlement in the occupied territories alone negates any progress made in other areas.

It is against this background that we also support the recommendations made by the Director-General of the ILO. We take the view that cooperation between the Israeli authorities and civil administration and the International Labour Organization will in future be a crucial prerequisite for an improvement in the situation of Arab workers.

We welcome the peace process now under way. It gives hope that the prevailing climate of mistrust will be dispelled, and that a new foundation for social coexistence will be laid.

Original French: Mr. ALDER (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Switzerland) – I would first of all like to congratulate the Director-General on his objective and detailed Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. This is a working document of great value for the discussion today.

The Director-General's Report reviews the many restrictions which military presence in the occupied territories continues to impose on Palestinian workers, in particular with regard to the freedom of employment choice, freedom of expression, freedom of movement and freedom of association. As the Report emphasizes, the duty of the ILO is to identify violations of the basic rights of workers and to work towards an improvement of the employment conditions for the population of the occupied territories.

My Government associates itself with the recommendations made in the Report which aim at mitigating the constraints imposed on Palestinian workers and improving their social protection. My delegation supports, in particular, the denunciation of a social security system under which a Palestinian worker does not enjoy all the benefits to which he would be entitled in respect of the contributions which he pays.

Switzerland very much deplores the escalation of violence in the occupied territories which has an extremely negative effect on large sectors of the Palestinian population who would like to go to Israel to work and who are prevented from doing so for various reasons. The closing off of the occupied territories since 30 March deprives tens of thousands of workers and their families of their everyday income and is contributing to the general impoverishment of the occupied territories.

If the Swiss Government welcomes the decision taken by the Israeli authorities to put an end to the establishment of new settlements, it is nevertheless extremely concerned about the fact that the existing settlements continue to grow at an accelerated pace. As is stated in the Director-General's Report, the confiscation of land and restrictions on water resources are gradually reducing the amount of land which is used by many farmers who, in turn, are forced to look for other jobs outside the occupied territories, which has increased their economic dependence on Israel.

Measures aimed at stimulating investment have recently been adopted by the civil administration responsible for the occupied territories. Nevertheless they remain inadequate and have not considerably or significantly improved the fate of the active Palestinian population, which continues to increase rapidly. Most workers for many years to come will not be able to find employment in the occupied territories. The Swiss Government fully supports the recommendation in the Report which asks the Israeli Government to avoid adopting any measures which may lead to the restriction or suppression of access by Palestinian workers to the labour market in Israel, as long as employment opportunities in the occupied territories remain limited. My delegation hopes that as soon as possible an end will be put to the sealing off for an indefinite period of time of the occupied territories, which is a veritable economic blockade, resulting in bankruptcies and lay-offs. The closing of frontiers has also led to a total separation between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank of the Jordan and to a partial cutting off between the north and the south of the West Bank, which in turn are cut off from access to East Jerusalem. This has not only severely disrupted the distribution of food products but has made it practically impossible for any internal travel for work purposes because pupils, teachers, doctors and lawyers, to give just a few examples, are no longer able to reach their place of employment in Jerusalem or on the West Bank for the inhabitants of Gaza.

The Director-General's Report has sketched out a very worrying picture of the situation of the workers in the occupied territories. The Report urges that increased efforts be made by the Israeli Government and the civil administration in order to remedy the situation. The Swiss Government attaches a great deal of importance to the observance of the principles, standards and resolutions of the International Labour Organization and the full application of respective standards of international law, in particular the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the protection of civilian persons in time of war.

My delegation is convinced that the settlement of the daily problems of the working population in the occupied territories is an important step towards a peaceful settlement to the problems in the Middle East. We therefore applaud any practical steps taken to achieve this objective.

Original Spanish: Mr. LAGO SILVA (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Cuba). – For some decades now there have been discussions in various international forums on the constantly deteriorating situation of the Palestinian people and the military occupation from which they are suffering in the occupied Arab territories.

Last year our Organization approved a series of recommendations which, if they had been applied by the Israeli occupying forces, would have improved the conditions of life in the occupied Arab territories and, in particular, the conditions of the workers.

In the months that have elapsed since then it has become increasingly obvious that the international community is incapable of resolving this problem. The Israeli authorities, with the support of the United States, continue to display a total arrogance and to flout the most elementary standards of international law as well as a growing number of resolutions and decisions adopted by various bodies in the United Nations system.

We cannot accept as an inevitable evil the sufferings which since the approval of the so-called partition of Palestine and the war of 1967 have been faced by the peoples of these territories and, in particular, the Palestinian people. We should remember that this terrible tribute of blood and tears which has been paid by the inhabitants of these occupied territories has been imposed upon them by those who suffered the outrages and atrocities of Nazism.

We should also remember that the Israeli military occupation and the subjugation and occupation by force of foreign territories has been declared by General Assembly Resolution 3314 (XXIX) as an act of aggression and offence against the peace and security of mankind.

There is no doubt that this continued military occupation is the root cause of all the violations of human rights suffered by the populations of these territories and which affect every aspect of the life of each and every one of them. These violations have been particularly serious since our debates and recommendations of last year. The evidence gathered by the special envoys of the Secretary General of the United Nations to these territories, the recent reports of the Special Committee entrusted with investigating Israeli practices in these territories and the report of the mission representing the Director-General of the ILO which visited these territories all bear witness to this.

In the report of the ILO mission there is clear evidence that the Israeli authorities are suppressing with violence and with a heavy toll of dead and injured, including children, any act on the part of the Palestinian population against the military occupation.

At the same time, they have carried on acts of destruction against the homes of Palestinian citizens and other property which form part of the cultural and religious heritage of these people. They have continued the condemnable practice of collective punishments imposed on various communities and they frequently arrest teachers and trade unionists, close down universities and schools and destroy harvests. Job opportunities are scarce or non-existent and Palestinian workers both in the occupied territories and in Israel have no social security protection and are unable to exercise their legitimate rights in full freedom.

As a culmination of these serious violations, on 16 December last, with the usual callousness, it was decided to deport to Lebanon 417 Palestinians; the decision was carried out the next day despite the fact that so-called peace talks had begun. This measure was taken not only in total disregard for the sovereignty of a neighbouring State, but hundreds of people were subjected to a fate which violates their most elementary rights, obliging them to remain exposed to the elements, separated from their families, in an inhospitable and inaccessible place deprived of the most elementary benefits of housing, food and clothing.

The Israeli authorities thus continue to act with impunity against the population of the occupied Arab territories and continue to fail to fulfil a large number of resolutions and decisions by the United Nations, and in particular of the Security Council. It is obvious this conduct of Israel receives the support of those who maintain a double standard of acting as a global policeman on the one hand and of advocating the establishment of a new international order on the other.

We reiterate that a just and lasting solution to the overall problem of the Middle East and of peace in the region will be possible only if the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and, in particular, their right to life and the establishment of an independent State, are recognized.

Thus our Organization should take decisions which energetically condemn Israeli practices in the occupied Arab territories and take the necessary steps to help ensure that peace, development and social justice become a reality for the workers of these territories.

Original Chinese: Mrs. ZHANG (Government adviser and substitute delegate, China) – We are very pleased that this special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories has been convened during the present Session of the International Labour Conference. We feel it is necessary and useful to have a continuing discussion on the situation of workers in those territories.

We have carefully read the Director-General's Report which is very informative and provides us with very detailed information on the situation of workers in the region concerned. For a long time now, as a result of war, occupation and unjust treatment, the legitimate rights and interests of the working population in the occupied Arab territories have been seriously undermined, and they and their families have had to struggle against hardship. This state of affairs did not improve last year. We have seen that the unjust policy pursued by the authorities in the occupied Arab territories, including such measures as closure of frontiers, deportation and ...

(The sitting was suspended for 15 minutes because of a technical hitch.)

Original Chinese: Mrs. ZHANG – For a long time now, the legitimate rights and interests of the workers of the occupied Arab territories have been seriously undermined. The workers and their families have endured severe hardship. This state of affairs has not improved in the past year. Since the competent authorities have enforced an unfair policy in the occupied territories through such measures as the closing of borders and deportation, workers have been deprived of wages, social security entitlements and other legitimate rights. Individual freedoms and security have been undermined. Tragic events have happened one after another. Such a situation contravenes the fundamental principles of the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia, and international labour standards, and should be a matter of grave concern to the international community.

Over the years, the Palestinian people have waged an uncompromising struggle for their independence and basic human rights. In their struggle, they have had the sympathy and support of Arab countries and other peoples around the world. The Chinese Government and people have always supported the just struggle of the Palestinians and other Arab peoples. The Palestinian people should enjoy all national rights and the right to survival and development in peace. Palestinian workers and their families should enjoy all the rights and the just treatment enshrined in the international labour standards. We call on the competent authorities to change their policy in the occupied territories, to ensure that the legitimate rights and interests of the Palestinian people, including the workers in the occupied territories, are respected.

We believe that the ILO should persevere with its efforts to combat the injustice suffered by workers in the occupied territories and safeguard their legitimate rights and interests. We have noted that, thanks to the efforts of the parties concerned and the impetus provided by the international community, the Middle East peace talks have started to display some positive signs. The Chinese Government welcomes this. We believe that confrontation and a hard-line policy will not bring about peace in the Middle East. We hope that the Middle East peace talks will continue in this positive way and that the sincere efforts of the parties concerned will achieve positive results at an early date and lead to a comprehensive and just peace in the Middle East. Only in this way can the legitimate rights and interests of the working people in the occupied territories be safeguarded.

Original French: Mr. SOMBES (Workers' delegate, Cameroon) – May I, first of all, on behalf of my delegation, convey to the President the greetings and best wishes of the workers of Cameroon and extend greetings to all those attending this session of the International Labour Conference. May I also associate myself with the various speakers who have preceded me in expressing our heartiest congratulations to the President and all the Officers of the Conference on their election and for the confidence placed in them as regards the conduct of this session. I wish them every success in carrying out this delicate and very important task.

I should also like to take this opportunity to express our sincere congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his election for a further term as Director-General of the ILO. We know we can rely on his competence and experience in bringing this great international organization safely into port.

The situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories is a very complex matter, but, it must be stressed that this is something that cannot leave us indifferent. I am therefore very pleased that this problem is included among the concerns of the ILO. I need only point to the enriching conclusions drawn in the Director-General's Report on the subject as evidence of this. At a time when we are witnessing the internationalization of solidarity movements all over the world, at a time when human rights in general, and more particularly trade union rights, are being defended firmly by all workers through trade union movements which are increasingly free and independent, we cannot, against a background of active worker solidarity, forget the plight of our comrades in the occupied Arab territories. That is why the workers of Cameroon wish to make an appeal to all those of goodwill to support the conclusions and recommendations set out in the Report of the Director-General. Nor can we disregard the need for dialogue between the different social partners. And we believe that this is the path which will lead to the resolving of the problems facing the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Mr. OTERO (Government delegate, United States) – To be very frank, my Government sees very little value in this special sitting. We regard it as an abuse of the ILO. It ignores and bypasses the regular supervisory machinery which is the Organization's constitutional method for dealing with worker rights complaints, and it is also a thinly veiled attempt to conduct a general political debate on a subject outside the ILO's mandate which is more appropriate to the United Nations General Assembly.

When Secretary Reich called on you to pay his respects, Mr. President, you both agreed on the vital importance of the Middle East peace process. This process must succeed. It must bring peace, at long last, to this troubled region. It must end the conflict, end the violence.

The Director-General's Report concludes in paragraph 149 that "the consequences of this violence... can be devastating for the Palestinian population as a whole, and more particularly for Palestinians with jobs in Israel who, because of increased harassment and restrictions, find access to their workplace rendered more difficult or even impossible".

Yes, the peace process must succeed and put an end to the conflict and to the violence. As the Report emphasizes in paragraph 147, its conclusions are "intended solely as a useful contribution to the more general process in which attempts are being made at the political level to seek solutions to the overall problems affecting the region".

Meanwhile, the Director-General's conclusions address what might be done to ease the situation. They note that "the closure of the territories means that over 100,000 Palestinians currently having jobs in Israel no longer have access to them, resulting in an estimated daily loss of income of some US$2.5 million", that "since the Gulf War ended..., the main source of external revenue of the territories has been limited to income earned by Palestinians working in Israel" and that since "remittances from workers in the Gulf and subsidies from Arab countries are no longer forthcoming, it is all the more important that the Palestinians who have jobs in Israel also have unrestricted access to them". The Report hopes "that in future other ways will be found to deal with 'violent' acts perpetrated by Arabs" from the territories in Israel. My Government is pleased that, since that time, ways have been found to allow 40 per cent of those Palestinian workers to return to their jobs. We sincerely hope renewed violence will not endanger this improvement and that many, many more workers will be able to return.

The Report notes some positive steps taken by the Government of Israel. It encourages further effort in these areas and makes other worthwhile recommendations to the Government of Israel to improve conditions for these workers, including their coverage under national insurance.

We welcome particularly the Report's emphasis on the essential role in a democracy of a strong and independent worker and employer organizations, like those in Israel, and the need for both Israel's Government and the Histadrut to encourage such institutions in the territories, as well as the Report's renewed appeal for dialogue and cooperation between the Histadrut and the unions of the West Bank and Gaza. We are pleased the Histadrut has written to offer such dialogue and we hope the unions of the territories will respond positively.

Above all, we welcome and encourage the ILO's endeavour to contribute to the improvement of the working and living conditions of the workers from and in the territories and agree that, and I quote, "its areas of competence, expertise and experience make it particularly apt to play an important role in creating an environment in which peace, social justice and economic development, based on democratic principles and the rule of law, can become realities for the entire population of the region".

As Secretary Reich emphasized in his speech to this Conference, the United States Government places great emphasis on the importance of vocational training to address the economic and particularly the employment problems now afflicting much of the world. The ILO is particularly well equipped to assist in this area, to help the youth of the territories prepare for a competitive world.

I would be remiss if I did not conclude by praising the authors of this Report for its excellence and balance, and the Government of Israel for cooperating in their mission to gather material to prepare it. However, procedures like this Special Sitting bypass the ILO's excellent regular supervisory machinery and create a precedent for new political debates singling out other member States.

I was going to close by reaffirming that we strongly oppose singling out Israel, or any other country, in a special sitting. However, now I find it compelling to respond to previous speakers by reiterating what our Government has stated in the Governing Body, a permanent conference on this matter would be intolerable to my Government and thus there is no consensus, which is a legal impediment.

Original Russian: Mr. KLOCHKOV (Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) – First of all I would like to thank the Director-General for the comprehensive and objective Report on this extremely acute problem which is of concern to all of us.

With great respect and gratitude we take note of the enormous amount of work that has been done by the special mission of the ILO which went to monitor the situation in the territories. It has provided a factual analysis in the Report of the Director-General. This is a very good basis for further development of the ILO's activities along these lines.

The situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories gives rise to serious concern throughout the world and, in particular, amongst trade unions. By their very nature, trade unions cannot accept violations or infringements of the rights of workers wherever this may take place.

As is quite clear from reading the Report, in this 26-year occupation of the Arab territories by Israel there has been serious violations of the fundamental rights of the workers and the whole of the Palestinian people. The situation continues to be explosive in this region, and has become even more acute after the Gulf crisis. The standards and principles of ILO Conventions are being violated. The economic situation of the Arab workers is worsening and trade union rights are being trampled under foot.

We fully agree with the conclusion of the Report that the ILO, as in the past, is continuing to feel a great deal of concern because of the situation being created in the occupied territories and the catastrophic impact which this has on the well-being of the indigenous population.

Unfortunately, some of the measures adopted by the Israeli authorities in dealing with the extremely difficult economic situation in these territories, and trying to find some kind of solution through negotiation have not led to any specific results at the present time. The positive role of establishing dialogue and finding a solution for the Palestinian problem can be found by Histadrut because, as we know, they are making efforts which give grounds for hope.

We believe that the conclusions of the Director-General's Report and the specific recommendations contained in the Report will help us to solve these serious and continuing problems which threaten the peace of the world, not just in the Arab region, but also in other parts of the globe, and we hope that the ILO, for its part, will make maximum efforts in order to bring this about.

I would like to emphasize the fact that the Federation of Independent Trade Unions in Russia would like to express its solidarity with the just struggle of the Arab workers for their rights. I would like to express our assurance that an end will be found to this crisis which has gone on for so many years.

Mr. LIOR (Government delegate, Israel) – Mr. President, I wish first and foremost, to express our appreciation and respect for the skill and talent with which you personally conduct the work of our Conference.

Once again we have gathered here due to pressure exerted by a minority of States, to waste long hours on a subject, highly important in itself, but of little relevance to the professional work of the ILO.

It became obvious in this same debate last year that for some delegations denigrating Israel has become simply a habit. In the light of the search for a new understanding in the on-going Middle East peace negotiations, this ritual of yesteryear is nowadays particularly harmful since it serves only to fuel the flames of discord.

Thus, once again we are forced to register our grievances at the singling out of Israel as a subject for special treatment. It is only in the interests of good relations with our Organization and the secretariat that we accord members of the Director-General's mission full and free access to Israel and the territories, which are widely open anyway to any visitor.

The report of the mission this year displays a growing understanding of the realities on the ground. It highlights the cycle of violence and, more importantly, points to the source of this violence in the actions of extremist organizations and individuals within the Palestinian community. It is clear from the report, maybe for the first time, that the recourse to violence is a major cause for the economic difficulties in the territories. Terrorism also inhibits the ability of international organizations to render meaningful assistance. Unfortunately, brutal acts against Palestinians and Israelis alike continue. During the month of the mission's visit alone, 13 Palestinians were murdered by their own brethren, and five Israelis were assassinated by the so-called "Palestinian workers".

The general approach of the more balanced report continues, however, to suffer from the tendency to judge progress in the territories by the norms of the developing world. In our opinion, the surrounding population of the region should provide the yardstick by which development in the territories is judged.

In any discussion of factors relating to economic progress it is clear that in the final analysis, and certainly in comparison with the previous period of Jordanian and Egyptian rule in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the leap forward has been undeniable; despite grave difficulties, the positive economic indicators speak for themselves. By the outbreak of the so-called intifada at the end of 1987, GNP had risen by over 400 per cent, with corresponding rises in the standard of living. Structural changes in the economy, such as the diversification of agriculture, the introduction of technologies, the development of new markets and growth in local industries have all contributed to a new social economic fabric, different from that which existed prior to the Six-Day War in 1967. Developments such as these are more important in the long term than any so-called settlement activity, which is one of the political derivations of the conflict rather than an economic factor.

Considerable efforts continue to be made by the Israeli authorities to improve the daily lot of the Palestinian population during the current period of transition, and until a political settlement is reached. The report underlines current efforts, and encourages Israel to continue them to increase investment and create employment.

The authors of the report mentioned the practical steps designed to ameliorate working conditions of Palestinian workers who have jobs in Israel. They also note that the Government of Israel does indeed envisage further improvements in the expedition of entry procedures. In this context I would like to say, first, that in years past, the Gulf States, not Israel, were the major employers of Palestinian labour. The report happens to overlook the negative effects of the refusal of a Gulf State to re-employ Palestinians since the end of the Gulf war. Second, while 100,000 workers were permitted entry to Israel prior to the wave of murders which made their employment an intolerable risk, today under more stringent controls 40,000 workers have already returned to their workplaces.

Yet as in any open democracy, the relations between foreign employees and local employers can only be partially controlled by government. Such working relations require not only official regulations but also workers' education as well, and in this respect there is a need for proper, genuine and bona fide trade union contributions.

In concluding I would like to state again that in spite of some improvement in the Director-General's Report this year, its very mandate remains questionable and problematic.

The winds of peace are blowing in the Middle East. You yourself, Mr. President, represent a country whose pioneering contribution towards peace will remain forever enshrined in the annals of our region. Israel continues to believe in dialogue. Indeed bilateral and multilateral talks are taking place in Washington and in other parts of the world. In the meantime, Israel does not claim immunity from criticism, but exercises such as this special sitting, which singles us out for this politically motivated criticism, places the ILO today squarely in the company of those whose activities are incompatible with the prevailing dynamics of peace. We are hopeful that the ILO will muster the courage to abandon the irrelevancies, and join the general effort to build a brighter and more promising future for the Middle East.

Original Chinese: Mr. HUANG (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, China) – We would like to voice our appreciation of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. Since we discussed the question of Palestine at this forum last year, the Middle East peace process has entered a new phase. Thanks to the efforts of the parties concerned and the international community, the peace talks are progressing in depth, opening up a new prospect for a political settlement of the Middle East question, centred on the issue of Palestine. Yet we note that the foundation of the peace process is quite fragile, the tasks ahead are serious, and it requires intensified efforts from us all to make achievements.

As hope dawns on the Middle East peace process, regrettably at the end of last year there was the incident in which the Israeli Government deported over 400 Palestinians. Chinese workers and trade unions are concerned and disquieted, and strongly condemn this inhumane behaviour by the Israeli Government that contravenes the norms of international law. We believe that the Israeli deportation of Palestinians from the occupied territories violates international law and the relevant United Nations resolutions, adds to the suffering of the Palestinian people, increases tension in the region and creates new obstacles for the Middle East peace process. This is why it met with universal condemnation from the international community. We strongly urge the Israeli Government to implement Security Council Resolution 799 (1992), and enable the deported Palestinians to return to their homeland as soon as possible.

The crux of the Middle East question is the issue of Palestine. Only after Israel withdraws from all the Arab territories it has occupied since 1967 can the question of Palestine be settled in a just and reasonable manner and the Middle East region attain lasting peace and stability. Over the past 40 years the Palestinian workers and people, in order to secure their national existence and regain their legitimate national rights, have waged successive struggles in difficult situations against Israeli aggression and expansion. We want to express our sympathy and support for and our admiration of the Palestinian people's heroic spirits.

The Chinese workers and people have always deeply sympathized with and firmly supported the Palestinian people's just struggle and endorsed their nation's rights to self-determination, and to return to their homeland and establish an independent State. We feel that the Arab-Israeli dispute should be settled through political means instead of resorting to force. The Palestinians and other Arab people's national rights should be maintained, and Israel's security should also be respected and assured. The Palestine question should be settled in a just and reasonable way in accordance with the relevant United Nations resolutions, especially Security Council Resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Israel should first of all stop building settlements in the occupied territories and deporting Palestinian civilians, and should allow deported Palestinian civilians to return to their homeland so as to create an atmosphere of conciliation, in order to gradually achieve a just and reasonable settlement of the Palestinian question. We hope the Middle East peace progress will continue, and that the parties concerned will seize the opportunity to be pragmatic and flexible, negotiate earnestly and remove obstacles so as to achieve lasting progress as soon as possible. It is also our sincere hope that the international community, the ILO and the parties concerned will make contributions to achieving a just and reasonable settlement of the Palestinian and Middle East question. The Chinese workers and trade unions will, as always, make unremitting efforts for the achievement for lasting peace, justice and stability in the Middle East.

Original Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' delegate, Lebanon) – A year has passed and we are once again in a special sitting. How do things look this time? In Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories the situation is deteriorating rather than improving, and the peace process has almost come to a standstill. The Director-General's Report does not include any detailed and specific measures which could be adopted by the Governing Body and could result in projects being financed from private funds in addition to the budget.

The experts who were sent to the territories have accomplished their work as well as possible. I believe, however, that the time has come to send a multidisciplinary team to discuss matters with the representatives of the employers and workers in Palestine to see what their needs are and how the International Labour Office can help them (vocational training, rehabilitation of disabled persons, strengthening of the employers' and workers' organizations).

The subject of the employers in the occupied Arab territories is a very sad one for it is they who bear the burden of the occupation which makes it impossible to set up free association. They have to pay innumerable taxes and levies which make regular production and competitiveness impossible. There are about 70 types of taxes and levies imposed on them by the military occupying forces.

In addition there are obstacles to the acquiring of raw materials, difficulties with regard to exportation and development and the impossibility of making full use of all the factors of production. As for the difficulties they face with regard to setting up free associations and developing them, these are examined in the report of the special mission.

A year ago I made a number of proposals to the Director-General that I will not go into again here. However, I will repeat my request that we should go beyond this special sitting. I believe that a special committee would be more suitable for the work we are doing here and would enable us to exert greater pressure to speed up the process towards establishing a just peace.

I was optimistic and I still am. But as Strindberg said, "We are killing time while waiting to find the key to happiness".

Mr. ZELLHOFER (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, United States) – I would like to thank the President for giving me this opportunity to address the fourth and what I am hopeful will be the last special sitting. There are certainly good reasons to believe this will be the last special sitting. Even more so than last year, there is a growing basis for optimism. The peace negotiations which began in the fall of 1991 have made significant progress, perhaps not always easily visible towards a comprehensive, just and peaceful settlement of this complex situation. This gives rise to a renewed cautious optimism that an agreement may be within reach. A comprehensive agreement that will ensure dignity and, importantly, security for all concerned.

Today, during this special sitting, we have before us now the 16th annual submission by the Director-General, entitled Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. It was most useful to note the efforts made by the workers in Israel through their national union, the Histadrut, to continue to provide important assistance and services to Palestinians from the territories working in Israel. The Histadrut committee for workers from the occupied territories continues and has expanded the extremely valuable advice and assistance, including the provision of free legal counsel to Palestinian workers regarding their rights and entitlements. The data on applications for legal advice and complaints being dealt with concerning Palestinian workers, as noted in the Director-General's Report, show more than 400 files, each concerning several workers, having been opened for the West Bank and 250 applications for legal advice, with 3,157 complaints being handled in the Gaza Strip.

A further significant problem has been the willingness of many Palestinian workers to avoid the system of registration and work for employers in Israel, often under very exploitive conditions, including working below prevailing rates and without the range of benefits which the system of registration guarantees. The situation of Palestinian workers, many dependent on income from work in Israel, is indeed serious and in need of sustained improvements. The situation for workers working inside the territories is even more precarious.

Less than two months ago, the Histadrut published a statement responding to the circumstances brought about by the 30 March closure of the territories. It recognized the Government's decision to take security necessary measures to protect Israeli citizens from a wave of extremist terror in the preceding weeks. It called for, among other compensatory and remedial measures, every effort to be made to provide emergency social assistance to the workers from the territories affected by the closure. It further recognized the Government's obligation to provide jobs for the workers of the territories and called upon the Israeli Government, Arab States and the international community to undertake an immediate joint effort of massive investment in the territories to help build an economic infrastructure which would provide employment for residents of the territories. Such a step, it noted, would be a timely and positive measure which would provide a basis of self-reliance for the Palestinians in the territories, preparing the ground for a gradual separation from Israel which would hopefully be agreed by the parties concerned in the course of the peace negotiations.

It should also be significant to observe today that earlier this year the Histadrut extended an invitation to the General Federation of Trade Unions to open a dialogue between the two organizations.

It is also timely to look back at last year's Report by the Director-General entitled Democratization and the ILO. It is particularly pertinent to the greater surrounding region, even more so today. That Report underscored how democracy "institutionalizes the settlement of disputes by enlisting the participation of the various interest groups and constant constructive negotiation leading to solutions that are acceptable to all". It is more than unfortunate, it is profoundly tragic that democracy and democratic institutions have not been allowed to develop in so many countries in the greater surrounding region.

Human dignity and thus human potential have been held in check by all too many regimes through the suppression of fundamental human rights, including one of its cornerstones, freedom of association. The constructive democracy-building role that genuine independent trade unions can play has repeatedly been thwarted, all too often violently. The lack of democracy and failure to develop supportive democratic institutions, coupled with gaping social inequities and widespread poverty, continue to be fertile ground for the seeds of fanatic, violent extremism. Last year I referred to some nearly 20 States in the greater surrounding region where either trade unions are either banned outright, collective bargaining is not permitted, trade unions are tightly controlled or their activities are severely restricted. Today, one year later, very little has changed.

In looking at the wide scale and all too often shocking extent of human and trade union rights violations in the greater surrounding region, I ask, why these special sittings? What can they really accomplish? I must repeat the very real grave concerns I voiced last year. Other than serving to politicize this unique and specialized United Nations body, these special sittings undermine the respect for the ILO's technical competence and authority and they weaken the effectiveness of its long-established and well-regarded supervisory machinery.

To politicize the work of the ILO would be tantamount to suffocating this Organization. While there are undoubtedly some in various parts of the world who would like to see this Organization wither, I would hope the vast majority of the ILO's constituents view this Organization's competence and authority as anchored in its unique mandate, and that mandate is not political.

The ILO faces a daunting challenge in the greater surrounding region to secure respect for human rights, economic justice and social equity. It is, again, essential to underline the ILO's competence, through the application of its standards developed by its unique tripartite structure and the obligation of member States to advance human dignity through social and economic democratization, an effort, we all know, that vitally involves the full participation of free and independent trade unions and employers' organizations.

The immense challenge faced by the ILO in the greater surrounding region needs to be acted upon by vigorously utilizing the full moral authority of the Organization, including, importantly, the proper supervisory machinery. Failure to do so would be to abandon its principles and destroy its purposes.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

It is indeed a great honour for me to stand here before this august assembly of this international Organization representing Saudi Arabian employers and to speak for them of the aspirations, dreams and hopes they have had for many years, long years filled with tragedies and tears, of oppression, suffering and aggression against a peace-loving people, a people with a culture and a civilization, a people destined and willed by God to live on a holy land which has been rendered holy and sacred by virtue of its location.

Yes, our hopes and wishes and dreams have been long held. They are dreams of freedom and liberty and a search for the minimum standards of human justice, human rights, and labour rights, and they are hopes and wishes for a liberalized economy and free commerce. If these people were given all these possibilities, they would be the most productive of all peoples on Earth.

Today, there are limited hopes for peace, and our eyes and minds are turned to that holy land, hoping that the banners of peace will soon be raised there so that the inhabitants of that holy land – Arabs and Jews – can live there together in peace to safeguard the culture and ancient civilization that was therein established.

We are a peace-loving people, seeking peace, and seeking to establish relations based not on racism or fanaticism on the basis of creed, colour or race, but on strengthened efforts to find peace. We would like to ensure equity and justice for Arab workers of the occupied territories, to strengthen the Palestinian economy and to grant Palestinian employers the freedom to trade and invest, and to have the opportunity to set up establishments to consolidate the economy in this part of the world.

Allow me, through you, to express my appreciation and gratitude to the ILO mission which undertook the task of fact-finding in the occupied Arab territories and which elaborated a realistic and honest report on the situation in the occupied Arab territories. We do hope that this special sitting, on the basis of this Report, will provide a justification to set up an ad hoc committee to investigate and examine the matter in more detail.

We fully support all the proposals and recommendations included in the Report.

I do hope that in the 1990s we will shortly be able to hold a special session to celebrate the freedom and the safeguard of human rights and liberty in that part of the world, namely Palestine and the occupied Arab territories.

Mr. HILB (Employers' delegate, Israel) – It gives me pleasure to join other speakers in congratulating the President on his election. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents.

This is the fourth time in the past four years that we have been through the process of holding a special sitting on the report of a special ILO delegation which has examined the conditions of workers in the territories. This is the 16th report on this issue and it seems that this sole issue is the only matter of interest to most of the delegates of the nations assembled in this hall.

During the past 16 years, many important events have taken place around the world, which are highly significant within the mandate of the International Labour Organization. Nevertheless, the issue of the territories has received the greatest amount of attention.

Fundamental approaches have not changed in the way the report examines the various issues. The critical approach shown by the report deals with the very essence of the problem, namely the fact that the ILO delegations have come to a situation created after the 1973 war. Since this is not new, it is obvious that the statement whereby it is assumed that the present situation does not enable employees' rights and dues to be preserved does not comply with reality nor is it relevant. The delegation should inspect the condition of workers from the territories in the light of the durable reality which exists in the territories, in Israel and the region as a whole.

It is highly regrettable that the Gulf War and the coalition that came into force to resist the terror have in no way changed some of the points reflected in this report. The increase of Arab terror in the territories has been a prominent feature in recent years. Arabs who are suspected of collaborating are punished by their own brothers, and any attempt to create communication between Israelis and Arabs is accompanied by a destructive desire to cause harm. This is worse than the injuries caused to Arabs by the Israeli army as a result of riots and stone throwing.

Any civilized State in the world which is attacked by knives and whose civilian residents are injured would behave in the same way, and would have ordered a closure similar to that carried out by the Israeli security forces. It is a fact that there has been some easing, and that more than 40,000 permits, equal to half the number issued before the closure, have been granted.

The deportation of terrorists is another subject dealt with in the report. This is something which adds to the politicization of the report and constitutes a deviation from the matters and subjects needing to be discussed.

The political atmosphere has remained businesslike and there is a feeling of progress both in the bilateral dialogue held in Washington and in the multilateral dialogue. The discussions are professional and the feeling of progress is becoming very strong.

It is useful to mention the contacts and communications established between businessmen from the territories, mainly Judea and Samaria, and major representatives of Israeli industry. Several meetings have been held on the issues of autonomy and trade. The options of joint investment, especially in the industrial zones that are being constructed and improved by the civil administration, were examined by both parties. Recently priority has been given to growth and the construction of plants. The consequences have been remarkable.

In discussions conducted with the Manufacturers' Association of Israel and other employers' organizations a start has been made on examining the autonomy issue. The subject was publicized in the media, in the employers' trade journals and in the daily newspapers in Israel.

There is no doubt that the closing off has affected thousands of employees who used to make their living in Israel as well as their employers. The implications are judicial in that any employee is entitled to assert his social or other rights affected by the present situation in the national labour courts.

There are two answers to the argument that employees' rights in the territories are compromised by the payment of contributions to the national insurance: first, social insurance is not personal insurance and in this matter Israel behaves like any other State. It is obvious that there is an insurance cost in some branches where employees contribute a portion of their salaries yet are not entitled to benefits in respect thereof.

Secondly, social insurance has become a quasi-tax collected by the State and used for various needs such as regional advancement and infrastructure development which are to the benefit of the vast population. The civil administration has done a lot to improve the living standards of the Arabs in the territory in using the budget that has been allocated for the administration and in struggling with difficulties resulting from the security situation. So far we have not seen States in general and Arab States in particular which have assisted in relieving the distress of the residents in the territories.

We, as employers as well as other representatives of the industrial sector, do aspire to the normalization of contacts with the territories and its residents. We are doing our best to cope with essential development for the sake of the region's welfare. We know that business initiatives and development can act as a trigger and a coefficient for certain issues and contribute to the good relations between people and nations more than any political activity carried out by politicians.

Original French: Mr. BRIESCH (Workers' delegate, France) – My presence during this debate is intended first of all as a sign of friendship to the workers of the region, Palestinians and Israelis, present in this debate in this hall. It is more concretely the sign of the interest of my organization, the French Democratic Confederation of Labour (CFDT), which concerns us all, especially in a year decisive for peace in this region.

A decisive year because of the important political events that have taken place in the countries concerned. Some have revitalized the peace process; others, unfortunately, have caused a blockage.

Thus the Director-General's Report invites us to measure the seriousness of this situation resulting from the closing of the occupied territories last March. We know what the price of this is. Its effect has already been to increase forced unemployment for the majority of the 120,000 workers who are working in Israel, without their benefiting from any alternative income. This means losses estimated at US$66 million, and lost wages representing one-third of the gross national product of the West Bank and Gaza. For eastern Jerusalem alone the loss of earnings is estimated at US$9 million, according to Mr. Shounar, the economic adviser to the Palestinian delegation at the peace negotiations. We do not think that this policy, whatever its motives, promotes the process of peace, because it is not a good idea to bring the economy of one's neighbours on its knees.

We are also, as trade unionists, aware of the exploitation by certain Israeli employers of thousands of clandestine Palestinian workers who are paid by the day, making it possible to reduce social costs. We particularly welcome the efforts of the Histadrut in carrying out important and energetic work to make the rights of workers better known and to put an end to these inadmissible practices. But the real difficulty in order to progress in this sector is the lack of transparency in the fiscal system and social deductions in force, which erode the social rights of the non-resident workers, as the Director-General has emphasized in his Report.

Nevertheless the strongest criticism and the greatest condemnation should be for the arrests of trade union militants, the ransacking of trade union premises in Gaza by the army in 1992 without any reason. The army sees in the Palestinian trade union movement a facade for certain terrorists organizations. This argument has already been used. My own Government used it in Algeria to prohibit the UGTA. We saw its limits when it was a question of merely not allowing Rassem El Bayari, the president of the Gaza workers' unions, to take part in the ICFTU Congress in Caracas in 1992. Is it intended by means of such intimidation and harassment to favour the rise of Islamic forces opposed to the dialogue that we are trying to promote?

These facts are disquieting and we must do all we can to make the hope of a peaceful solution prevail. We know that it will take a long time but there are already signs, if only through two signals from the trade union movement in the region. We welcome the renewal of the unification effort in the Palestinian trade union movement. And we welcome the first fruits of the new direct dialogue between the Histadrut and its Palestinian counterpart. How could the CFDT not welcome this idea of direct dialogue, a tangible proof of mutual recognition. We believe indeed that by strengthening such measures it will be possible to reduce social tension and improve the prospects for economic development in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The ILO, whose technical cooperation and action shown have proved useful to the South African trade union movement and the democratic modernization of labour relations in South Africa, can be a decisive tool with which to tackle the labour problems of the occupied territories. We are convinced that its offer cannot be rejected or ignored indefinitely.

We also believe that the free international trade union movement, strengthened by the growing confidence of millions of workers throughout the world, is well placed to contribute to this dialogue and to promote the establishment of a just and lasting peace in this region.

Original Arabic: Mr. TIZMAGHZ (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The Holy Koran states that God shall bring victory to those who struggle for his cause and suffer injustice.

Many years have passed since the beginning of the Palestinian problem and a solution seems no nearer. The Palestinian Islamic intifada is a movement and a revolution against occupation and expansionism. This heroic intifada is taking place under very difficult circumstances. The aggressive Zionist entity is perpetrating the worst form of oppression against this movement. Zionists, with the support of their Government, terrorize and murder Palestinians and expropriate their property, their pain and sufferings.

This oppressive regime perpetrates to the worst forms of injustice in the administration of Palestine and the occupied territories. The Palestinian people have been expelled, thanks to Zionist and international pressure, from their homes and their homeland. Murder, oppression, repression of human rights are everyday occurrences. The noble intifada faces the worst difficulties. Last winter, the Zionist regime deported more than 400 Palestinians from their homes and homeland to endure conditions of bitter cold. Security Council resolution No. 799 has yet to be implemented. The oppressive regime did not even take note of it. Under such circumstances, how can we talk about the failure to implement international labour standards, when the Zionist enemy has not even taken note of the Security Council resolutions, international standards, the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the Philadelphia Declaration or even the Geneva Convention of 1949.

The Islamic Republic of Iran believes that the peace negotiations have failed to safeguard the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. Indeed, they strengthen the foundations of the Zionist entity, which imposes its own terms on the other party, and continues to murder…

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I must ask the speaker to speak on the Director-General's Report and nothing else.

Original Arabic: Mr. TIZMAGHZ – In the light of these circumstances, can we guarantee that this regime will abide by a peace agreement, especially given the fact that as it refuses to respect Security Council resolutions? Our experiences over the past 50 years show that peace will not return to the region unless the Palestinian people recover their legitimate rights and enjoy their own independent government in Palestine, and until there is a total withdrawal from the occupied territories.

As you know, the Islamic Republic of Iran is and always has been one of the defenders of the oppressed Palestinian people. We call on the international community to take positive steps to safeguard the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. One of the duties of the international community is to examine the economic and social deterioration in the territories and the failure to observe trade union rights, and to confront them. The International Labour Organization must support the cause of the expelled Palestinians. It must do all in its power to bring about their return to their homeland and to reinstate them in their jobs.

We once again wish to call on the International Labour Organization to establish a special committee to defend the rights of workers and employers in Palestine. May peace and the mercy of God be with you.

Original Portuguese: Mr. LANCA (Workers' delegate, Portugal) – We would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization for convening this special sitting and for the important report of the Director-General on this issue, i.e. the occupied territories.

We make it a point of honour to take part in this sitting to express the unequivocal support and solidarity of the Portuguese workers for the Palestinian cause.

We have always condemned the occupation of these territories by Israel and the consequent limits upon the exercise of the free rights and liberties of the Palestinian workers. In this context, we support the United Nations resolutions which require – and this is more necessary than ever – the withdrawal of the occupying forces from the territories and the establishment of a peaceful path of dialogue and negotiation.

The long and staunch resistance of the Palestinian people in those territories, in addition to being an example for the world, also reveals the widespread support that it enjoys from all Palestinian people in the territories.

It is with a deep feeling of hope that, at last, we witnessed the opening of negotiation and dialogue with the participation of Palestinian representatives and with the support and commitment of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, which is the Palestinian people's legitimate representative.

Hence, the international community cannot and should not adopt a passive attitude to all attempts to reduce the effectiveness of the ongoing negotiations and to void them of content.

That is why the workers and their trade unions have also an important role to play in denouncing the illegal occupation and promoting among their members the demand of a peaceful and negotiated solution to the problem.

In Portugal we shall continue to demonstrate our active solidarity with the Palestinian people's struggle for self-determination, a cause that deserves our deepest respect and a struggle which, deserving of our admiration, will continue to receive our unequivocal support.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – Mr. President, please accept the warm congratulations of the Organization of African Trade Unity and myself on your election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that under your able leadership the work of the Conference will be brought to success.

I would like to compliment the Director-General for the clarity of his report on the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. The optimism that was generated by the change of government in Israel last year on the solution of the problem of the Middle East has not been justified by the facts on the ground. The lives of the Palestinian workers and peoples have continued to deteriorate and their situation is more desperate than ever before. This situation has naturally made the Palestinians more frustrated and angry. Which people, subjected to the same degrading and inhuman conditions, would do less than the Palestinians?

Paragraphs 67 to 72 of the report confirm the inadequate attention given by the Israeli occupation authorities to the education and training of the Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories. We condemn this attitude because of the negative effects inadequate human resource development will have on the future of Palestinians. The ILO and the international community should therefore put pressure on the Israeli Government to ensure the unimpeded development of the education and training of Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories.

The conditions of work of Palestinian workers, as reported in paragraphs 73 to 94 of the report, confirm the harshness of the situation under which Palestinian workers work as very unsatisfactory and, in our opinion, dehumanizing. The outdated Jordanian labour law of 1965, which is supplemented by Israeli military orders, applied to Palestinian workers in the West Bank, and the equally outdated Egyptian legislation of 1957 applied to the Palestinian workers in the Gaza Strip should all be abolished. If the Israeli occupation authorities cannot apply the current Jordanian and Egyptian labour laws to the Palestinian workers of the West Bank and Gaza Strip effectively, then they should apply the Israeli labour legislation that governs the conditions of work of Israeli workers.

It is unacceptable that a Government that claims to be civilized should apply slave labour conditions on Palestinian workers in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, the United Nations Human Rights Charter and other international laws. The ILO should therefore exert further pressure on the Israeli Government for the urgent and drastic improvements in the conditions of work of the Palestinian workers.

On the situation in the Golan, as reported in paragraphs 110 to 122, there is no improvement in the conditions of the 130,000 Syrian Arabs living in that place. We condemn the arbitrary annexation of the land and water resources of the inhabitants of the Golan for the Jewish settlers. It is another example of the violation of the rights of the people of Golan and an arrogant misuse and abuse of power by the Israeli occupation authorities.

On the effects of the establishment of Israeli settlements on the lives of Arab workers in the occupied territories, dealt with in paragraphs 133 to 135 of the report, the only conclusion one can draw is that the settlements have worsened the conditions of the Palestinian people. With 52 per cent of the land in the West Bank and over 40 per cent of the land in Gaza Strip seized by the Israeli occupying forces since 1967, the lives of the ever-increasing Palestinian population cannot be anything but miserable.

The establishment of the new Jewish settlements in the Golan and other occupied Arab territories, contrary to the declarations of the new Labour Government of Israel, makes it difficult to believe that Israel has real intentions for the peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict.

We call upon the Israeli Government to stop the building of new Jewish settlements and other inhuman actions against the Palestinians and the Syrian Arabs in all the occupied Arab territories as a goodwill gesture to facilitate reciprocal gestures on the part of Palestinians and Arabs in order to arrive at peaceful, just and lasting resolution of the Middle East conflict.

We commend the technical assistance given by the International Labour Office and other United Nations agencies to the Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories. Further assistance should be offered to the Palestinians, especially in the areas of education and training, cooperatives, vocational training and entrepreneurship development, trade union administration and management.

We agree with the conclusions of the report and call on the Israeli Government to implement all the recommendations contained in the report.

The African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity once more reiterate our unflagging support to and solidarity with the Palestinian workers and peoples in their just struggle against oppression and annexation, and for an independent Palestinian State in a stable and peaceful Middle East.

Original Russian: Mr. BORCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – We have carefully studied the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. It is informative and honest. There can be no doubt that its authors made every effort to use the possibilities afforded by the International Labour Organization to improve the working conditions and living conditions of the Arab workers in the territories occupied by Israel. At a more general level, the Report is a persuasive appeal for reason, for goodwill, for a speedy political settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, and for the restoration of the rule of law and justice in the long-suffering land of Palestine.

In paragraph 9 of the Report, the point is stressed that political questions as such do not come within the ILO's terms of reference. Nevertheless, in carrying out its mandate, the ILO cannot ignore the consequences of the political situation in the occupied territories for the free exercise by workers of their rights. We share this view. There is no doubt that the solution of the whole set of social and labour problems in the region is part and parcel of the overall task of achieving a that is the political settlement through negotiations between all the interested parties.

The Russian Federation, as co-chairman of the Middle East peace talks, sees its main task as being the creation of optimum conditions for the negotiations. I am sure that everyone in this hall is aware that decades of confrontation have created vast reserves of distrust and hostility. But all the experience of history teaches all of us, which shows that as regards the establishment of peace, even the most difficult and lengthy negotiations are better than any successful and brief war.

Russia is taking vigorous steps to help bring about a general improvement in the humanitarian situation in the occupied territories. We support close cooperation and are accordingly engaged in dialogue with both the Arabs and with Israel.

We are convinced that peace can be achieved on the basis of respect by the parties involved for their respective legitimate concerns, that is to say peace based on equal rights and equal security of both Arabs and Israel.

The Russian Federation consequently favours a solution to the Palestine question based on the provisions of the United Nations Charter and in particular, the right of nations to self-determination, which is an inalienable right of the Palestinian peoples. We are emphatically opposed to the use of force and terror by both sides. We are against the violation of human rights in the occupied territories. We are in favour of a total cessation of the continuing practice of building Israeli settlements in those territories.

In conclusion I would like to say that we support the Conclusions and Recommendations contained in the Report. The International Labour Organization should continue within its terms of reference to make a positive contribution to the process of finding a peaceful settlement in the Middle East.

Original French: Mr. SAMBA KEBE (Workers' delegate, Guinea) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his unanimous election, in so doing, to express the hope that we will achieve success in the quest for effective solutions to the problems under discussion. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his clear and succinct Report, which allows all of us here to grasp the seriousness of the subject under discussion.

The world, at the end of this twentieth century, is undergoing far-reaching changes which are absorbing everyone's attention and everyone's energy. One of the most striking aspects we believe is undoubtedly the rapid advance of democracy in our countries. The world is looking for justice; better yet, it is fighting tirelessly and without fear for justice and equity so that peace and happiness may be shared by everyone, whoever they are. It is a matter of urgency that those occupying the Arab territories of Palestine should understand that only dialogue will bring peace. The workers in the occupied territories must be authorized freely to organize themselves and enjoy all freedoms and permanent employment.

The International Labour Organization is today the yardstick by which justice and the protection of the victims of injustice are measured. The unjustifiable occupation of the Palestinians homeland is becoming a matter of ever greater concern, and is now a genuine challenge. We must here welcome the objectivity of the report placed before us. The solutions proposed by the Director-General of ILO have the firm support of my delegation, and of the workers of my country.

We say that freedom and peace are indivisible. This assembly must speak out unambiguously for just solutions. We need to think in terms of concrete solutions because there is no point adopting resolutions if they are not going to be implemented. Let us hope that goodwill on all sides will make possible the earliest success of the negotiations now under way.

Are we going to allow ourselves to be caught out by a new kind of apartheid? That would be a pity because the first apartheid regime, through its insolence and cruelty, is costing the international community dear – particularly the International Labour Organization. Enormous funds and energies have been expended, the real extent of which can never be reckoned. The establishment of settlements in the occupied territories constitutes an impediment to development and a dangerous threat to peace.

The workers of the Republic of Guinea, through me, assure you of their solidarity and of their availability for the struggle on behalf of this just cause.

Original Spanish: Mr. LAZO PERALTA (Workers' delegate, Peru) – We take the floor at this special sitting with great concern for the workers of the occupied Arab territories, to reiterate clearly our solidarity with the workers and the people of Palestine, and with their indisputable and inalienable right to live in peace, freedom and justice in their own sovereign State.

This special sitting, together with the Director-General's 16th Report on this serious situation affecting hundreds of thousands of workers, and which we have read very carefully, demonstrate that there is a clear lack of political will to solve these problems.

The Director-General's Report denounces the lamentable conditions to which the Palestinian workers are subjected, and that Report requires no further comment from us.

We Peruvian workers, who know through our own flesh and blood the vexation and dehumanization which can be imposed upon workers by foreign minority interests, are well placed to understand and sympathize fully and legitimately with the plight of these workers, and to demand an immediate solution for such lamentable situations.

Once again, the Director-General in his recommendations calls for alternative solutions to be found urgently, consistent with the principles of the International Labour Organization. But we find no such corresponding attitude among those who could take action to solve these problems.

We who identify with our predecessors, who battled for political independence, we who continue the fight for social justice, for real democracy and full freedom for our peoples, we who have suffered and still suffer ourselves so often from the oversight or negligence of certain international organizations, we were not surprised at all by the speed with which certain States in the recent past rushed into what came to be called the Gulf war. Nor are we surprised at the passive complicity we see regarding this. The first resolution of the United Nations calling for the occupied territories to be freed was adopted in 1967.

We condemn the increase in acts of violence caused specially by the military occupation, which renders it impossible to exercise civil and political liberties freely and which prevent the workers and people of Palestine from enjoying basic human rights and freedoms. International agreements on such matters have been ratified by the States concerned. They should be implemented.

Hence we support the proposal to set up a special commission and we consider it particularly important to strengthen the ILO's cooperation programme. We propose the appointment of an ILO official to operate within the occupied territories themselves, and we encourage the ILO to use all institutional ways and means possible to achieve an effective dialogue and to facilitate a political solution with full popular and democratic support, for to the benefit of the workers and people of Palestine.

Original Farsi: Mr. GHETASSI (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We pray to God Almighty to guide us and crown our efforts with success. The peace and the blessings of God be upon you.

I should like to thank you for having given me this valuable opportunity to speak on the Palestinian problem.

First and foremost, I should like to express our gratitude to the Director-General of the ILO for having prepared a report on the situation of the workers in Palestine and the occupied territories, and to emphasize the necessity to safeguard social justice, in accordance with the Declaration of Philadelphia.

To speak of the Palestinian issue is endless and could go on forever. No matter how much we say, it will be but a drop in a huge bucket. The Palestinian issue is one of the most important in the latter half of this century and one of the most important problems facing the Islamic world. It is the most crucial problem in our contemporary world.

I am referring to the sufferings of a whole people – the sufferings and the oppression and injustice they are confronted with. It is a cancer in the heart of the Islamic countries. It is the usurpation of a homeland, an incessant oppression and deprivation of two generations of Palestinian people. Today, as the popular intifada gains support in the occupied territories, warning notes are ringing in the ears of the Zionist oppressors and occupiers who have acted inhumanly and have waded in the blood of children, women and old people.

You know that the means used by the Zionist enemy are more cruel now than ever and call for greater prudence than ever. The whole of mankind throughout the world should look upon this problem with great gravity and seriousness and should exert every effort…

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Please confine your remarks to the report of the Director-General.

Original Farsi: Mr. GHETASSI – The increased dependence of some countries of the region to the sweeping imperialist hegemony has given the opportunity to the Zionist occupying entity to wage daily vicious attacks, and it is supported in this by the outstanding and powerful Satan, which is considered one of the most serious enemies of all peoples.

More weapons of mass destruction accompany developments in the new international order which exports such weapons to the Middle East, which supports the daily air raids on southern Lebanon, and which bombards unarmed Palestinian and Lebanese civilians. They seek to perpetrate violations of human rights and trade union rights, and to imprison and detain hundreds of Palestinian workers. All these are inhuman practices and actions committed by the Zionist entity, and there are other attempts to massacre, to kidnap and to commit crimes which cannot even be imagined by anybody but the criminal Zionists…

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I should like you to stick to the subject under consideration, within the framework of the Director-General's Report, and to keep away from political issues.

Original Farsi: Mr. GHETASSI – As everybody knows, imperialist and colonial countries and world imperialism have always used the Zionist entity as a means of exerting pressure on countries of the region and have used it as the poison, the dagger, against the Islamic world.

Therefore it is no surprise for the Zionists to perpetrate their continued violations of international laws and human rights and to incessantly seek to perpetrate aggression against unarmed peoples, using atomic weapons and other practices which, if taken up by any other country which is not affiliated to the colonialist powers, would be tantamount to a great tragedy.

Therefore, it is no surprise that the Zionist occupants resort to all these practices, enjoying the support of the great Satan. Thus, it becomes evident that the usurping Zionist entity today constitutes the gravest danger and menace to our world. We have to continue to support the popular uprising inside the occupied territories.

And on this basis, in my name and on behalf of the organization I represent in the Islamic Republic of Iran, I should like vehemently to condemn the current peace talks in the region which are futile and which are doomed to failure as they have been in previous sessions. The late Imam Khomeini has said that such talks are doomed to failure.

I hope that all your efforts will be crowned with success and that all corruption and all manifestations of corruption will be uprooted from all Islamic countries. I hope that we will all have the opportunity to go to Jerusalem to pray for unity.

In conclusion we should like to emphasize the importance of setting up a standing committee to consider the situation of Palestinian workers and to establish a declaration following the conclusion of this special sitting.

God Almighty has said that he helps those who help themselves. I thank you all for lending me listening ears and may the peace and blessings of God be upon you.

Ms. PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) – Before I turn to the Report of the Director-General, I would like to mention that my organization, the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions (LO), recently celebrated their 28th Congress. The Congress addressed a statement on the situation in the Middle East. We, of course, are pleased that the peace process seems to have started again. We stress that to ensure that the peace process succeeds, the deported Palestinians must be allowed to return to their homes and the influence of extremist fundamentalist groups must be reduced; furthermore increased support of the PLO as the only legal representative of the Palestinians, as well as of the peace process in Israel – including the progressive labour movement within Histadrut – is necessary.

Our statement further underlines the following. The United Nations must take on responsibility for a solution of the conflict. A lasting solution presupposes that the United Nations participates actively in the negotiations, provides guarantees and initiates cooperation for economic development. The right of the Palestinian people to their own State and self-determination must be realized. Israel must withdraw from the occupied territories and be guaranteed a country within safe borders. The security of the border must be ensured, if needed, by United Nations presence.

This year's Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories points to factors that have had a crucial impact on the economic situation in Gaza and the West Bank. First of all the Gulf war, which led to a 45-day curfew and a considerable income loss; and since then the closing of the borders in June and December last year as a consequence of the killing of Israelis, and the still ongoing curfew that was initiated this spring.

The report hopes that the closure of the territories will soon be lifted, and that in the future other ways will be found to deal with criminal acts perpetrated by Arabs against Israelis. To this I would like to add that a collective punishment of a whole community for acts committed by extremist groups or individuals only leads to a further strengthening of the tension in the region and thus to an increased influence of the extremist forces in question. Therefore, the attempts to reduce the influence of extremists by way of reacting against the population in general must end.

The economic impact of these closures on the societies concerned is documented in the report. We are deeply concerned for the thousands of Palestinian workers from the occupied territories who earn their living by working in Israel. Since the closing of the borders this spring more than 100,000 Palestinians have lost their jobs without receiving material compensation. This is in spite of the fact that these workers pay taxes to Israel and are thus legally entitled to unemployment benefits.

This fact is pointed out in the Director-General's report. Although there is a reference in the report to the Israeli Government's argument that the Palestinian workers in Israel benefit from a tax credit points system which outweighs the value of the social security benefits they do not receive, the report stresses that the Palestinian workers do not receive all the benefits that they are entitled to from the social insurance contributions which are deducted from their wages automatically.

The living and working conditions of these workers, when allowed to work, are extensively treated in the report. I will not repeat the descriptions in the chapter on working conditions; but I do point to the fact that the severe difficulties and often unjust treatment many Palestinians workers encounter every day are not conducive to a reduction of the tensions in the region. We therefore propose increased pressure on the Israeli Government, first in order to attain a reopening of the borders and a reinstatement of the dismissed Palestinian workers, and secondly, to ensure that Israel complies with its obligations towards the workers who became unemployed as a result of Israeli policy. However, we certainly also believe in pressure on the Palestinian bodies – and on those who are close to or take part in the negotiations. Both parties must now give. It is in their common interest to seek and to find accommodations and a lasting, peaceful and mutually satisfactory solution. There is no time to lose.

The LO has, as others, followed developments in the Middle East for many years. Our involvement manifests itself in the long-standing and good relations between the LO and the trade union organizations in the region. The relations between the LO and Histadrut are close and we also enjoy good contacts and close cooperation with the Palestinian Trade Union Federation, (PTUF) the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) in the West Bank and the Confederation of Palestinian Trade Unions in Gaza.

I would like to conclude by stating our support for the recommendations proposed by the Director-General in his report. We urge the parties to act. We believe in dialogue because this would represent a long step forward and create a basis for cooperation. It would help improve living and working conditions and, by way of mutual recognition, contribute to diminishing tension, and thus to better prospects for peace in the region.

Original Spanish: Mr. DEL RIO DOÑE (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – We have come to this rostrum during this special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories to repeat our expression of solidarity with the workers and people of Palestine and with their indisputable and inalienable right to live in justice, freedom and peace in their own independent sovereign State.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General for the holding of this special sitting and for the presentation of this 16th report on the very serious situation with affects hundred of thousands of workers. We would like to state that there is a lamentable lack of political will to resolve the deplorable situation of the Palestinian workers. The Report brings new considerations before us and denounces the disgraceful conditions of the Palestinian workers. The workers and people of the Dominican Republic, who are fully familiar with the injustice, oppression and domination which can be imposed on workers by foreign minority interests, express their full solidarity with the Palestinian people and demand an immediate solution to this deplorable situation.

Those of us who denounce in international forums the establishment of new Israeli settlements in the occupied territories and listen to grandiloquent promises of halting such policies observe the extension of the military presence and control with all the negative consequences which this has for the search for an urgent improvement in the conditions of life and work of the Palestinian workers. We appeal for urgent alternative solutions to be found which are consistent with the basic postulates of the International Labour Organization. We peoples and workers who fight for social justice, for real democracy, for real freedoms for our own peoples, we know only too well what effects negligence and forgetfulness by certain international bodies can have. We therefore condemn the increase in the acts of violence brought about mainly by the military occupation of the territories, which makes it impossible for the Palestinian people to enjoy the free exercise of their basic civil and political freedoms and the full respect of the human rights and freedoms of the workers and people of Palestine, as set forth and ratified by the States concerned.

We support the proposal to set up a special committee and recommend that the ILO should strengthen its cooperation in this area. We propose that a special official should be appointed by this Organization and be assigned to the occupied territories. We call for the use of all institutional means possible to achieve an effective dialogue which will facilitate the adoption of a peaceful, popular and democratic solution to the benefit of the workers and the entire people of Palestine.

Mr. TSUJINO (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Japan) – Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to share my thoughts on the subject under discussion with my friends who have gathered here from all over the world.

We all aspire to world peace for the sake of all mankind. Though we grow up in different countries, in different regions, and in different circumstances, we are all human beings.

Peace is the most important element and a basis for human life.

Appendix II of the Director-General's Report explains in detail the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, based on the findings of the mission sent to Israel and the occupied Arab territories.

I do hope that all human rights are respected and protected along the lines which the ILO has been trying to promote and develop. No distinction, no discrimination should be allowed on the ground of race or religion in our world today.

As you know, in 1991 the negotiations for peace between Israel and the four Arab countries directly concerned started in Madrid. They marked a first in history. Multilateral negotiations began in Moscow in January 1992. I sincerely hope that these negotiations will make progress, and that peace will come to the Middle East as soon as possible.

We have a saying in Japanese, Mizu ni nagasu. It means "Let bygones be bygones". This saying teaches us that past grudges should not lead to everlasting fighting and unhappiness.

We have mutually to learn to live in peace. Human beings are not almighty, but at least they are gifted with wisdom. Let us seek a better and peaceful world without being fettered by legacies of the past. We should strive to build a new peace for now and for the future.

Mr. CANKOREL (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Turkey) – At the present special sitting of the Conference, we have before us the 16th annual report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. We are pleased to read in the report that the mission was carried out with the full cooperation and participation of all parties concerned, both Israeli and Palestinian. On this occasion, we would like to express our confidence in the constructive role of the International Labour Organization for finding comprehensive solutions to the labour and economic conditions in the occupied Arab territories, thus facilitating the solution of the overall political problems in the region.

We understand from the report presented to the 80th Session of the Conference that there are certain urgent decisions to be taken by the Israeli Government in order to improve the working conditions in the occupied Arab territories, where the economic situation is known to have deteriorated owing to the tight security measures imposed by Israeli authorities in order to control the political tension.

As mentioned in the report, some of the drastic security measures such as the closure of the occupied Arab territories, have the potentiality of aggravating the already difficult economic situation of Palestinians, and possibly pushing them to more radical reactions which may endanger any tangible peace process between parties.

My Government has already reiterated its call on Israel to recognize the de jure application of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied Arab territories, and has expressed its concern that the continuation of the Palestinian plight and the cycle of violence can only lead to more problems, delaying any peaceful and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, which is a main cause of the political instability in the Middle East.

On this occasion we would like to express once again our sincere conviction that the continuing state of occupation is a major obstacle to the full enjoyment of human rights of the population living in these territories, and that the actual situation has very negative consequences on the conditions of workers, dramatizing even more the existing plight.

We would recommend the Israeli authorities to refrain from punishing the Palestinian population as a whole for crimes which may have perpetrated by individuals.

It would be most welcome to witness improvements towards the equal treatment of the Palestinians working in Israeli companies. We believe that such fair treatment could become an important impetus for the creation of mutual trust and good will between Palestinians and the Israeli authorities.

In this regard, a more transparent social security system would undoubtedly help to strengthen a productive dialogue between Palestinian workers and Israeli authorities.

I would like once again to underline a well-known reality, namely, that the policy of settlements in the occupied Arab territories, which has been declared illegal several times by the international community, has very destructive effects on any peace effort in the Arab-Israeli conflict. We found it very pertinent that the Director-General's Report has emphasized the importance of the settlement issue in a broader context.

In the light of the conclusions and recommendations contained in paragraphs 147 to 161 of the report, we would like to underline that, regardless of the positive impact of the measures to be taken in order to improve the economic and working conditions in the occupied territories, a lasting solution to the plight of the Palestinian people still depends on a political solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Our sincere hope is that the parties will seize every opportunity to continue with perseverance the dialogue towards a peaceful solution of the conflict. We would like to urge the concerned parties to refrain from any provocation which may impede the peace process.

Turkey therefore avails itself of this opportunity to express its readiness to contribute to all peace efforts and we welcome any contribution to reach the aim of peace and cooperation in our region.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASSOUL (representative of the Arab Labour Organization) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, I shall begin the statement of the Arab Labour Organization which I have the honour to represent at this important international meeting by quoting from paragraph 148 of the Director-General's Report, which contains a sound analysis of the matter under discussion. The Director-General says: "A state of military occupation renders impossible [I repeat renders impossible] the free exercise of those civil and political liberties that are essential if certain [I repeat certain and not all] fundamental standards and principles that have been developed by the International Labour Organization are to be full respected".

On the Israeli settlement policy, the members of the mission reaffirmed, as in previous years, that "as far back as 1979, the Director-General's representatives stated that they found it difficult to imagine that the settlements policy of the Israeli authorities could be pursued without conflicting with the objective of development by and for the local population and, therefore, without it jeopardizing their chances of employment" (paragraph 134).

The Report before us presents a dark picture of the living, working and social conditions of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. This bears out what was said by the United Nations Committee in its report to the General Assembly at its 47th Session to the effect that the human rights situation in the territories is extremely serious and beyond our powers of imagination, that material and health conditions are deplorable and that the population has reached a stage of bare subsistence – I repeat, has reached a stage of bare subsistence.

I should also like to refer to paragraph 153 of the Report in which the Director-General refers to "the degrading treatment and abuse which the workers have often to endure there". He also refers to "... cases of workers being subjected to exploitation, blackmail, discrimination and other abuses in their employment in Israel" (paragraph 84).

Since the first special sitting in 1990, this tragic situation has been steadily worsening, especially in human, labour-related and social terms, despite the moderate tone of the recommendations of the ILO's mission designed to alleviate the suffering of the workers and people of Palestine and despite the promises of peace that aroused a certain amount of hope among those who aspire to peace and social justice for all peoples of the world. The working and living conditions of the workers and people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are becoming steadily harsher and more difficult to bear. The settlements have spread and natural resources in the form of land and water continue to be confiscated.

We in the Arab Labour Organization are fully aware of the fact that the International Labour Organization, which enjoys considerable international respect, has an unparallelled reputation among specialized international agencies and possesses the necessary material and moral resources, has not assumed its full responsibility vis-à-vis the workers and people of Palestine. Its achievements, however important, are still few and far between, and its performance has not matched its principles and its basic values and aims, to which the Palestinian people aspire, just as they also aspire to democracy and freedom like all the other peoples of the world. We hope that the deliberations of this Conference and of the Governing Body will remain non-political. We call upon you to take full account of the consequences of the military occupation and Israeli colonization on the social, economic humanitarian and working conditions of all workers and the population living in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. All these issues fall within the competence of the International Labour Organization. We call upon the Conference to examine to what extent the Resolution concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and the violation of trade union freedoms and rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories and the Resolution concerning the implication of Israeli settlement in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers, adopted in 1974 and 1980 respectively have been implemented.

The Arab Labour Organization shares the opinion of those who have drawn attention to: (1) the need to appoint a permanent representative of the ILO in occupied Palestine so that he can follow closely the conditions in which workers and employers are living and so that he can monitor the implementation of technical cooperation programmes; (2) the need to establish a unit within the ILO to monitor the situation of the Palestinian people and workers. We commend the Director-General's nomination of Mr. Maier to supervise this activity. We hope that this branch will be expanded and be in a position to study the situation and promote monitoring activities; (3) the Governing Body and its Commission on Discrimination should set up a committee within the framework of this Conference, which would be responsible for examining the annual Report of the Director-General and proposing ways and means of implementing the recommendations that it contains. Fourthly and lastly, all talk of support for the steadfast workers and people of Palestine is to no avail unless it is accompanied by well-defined and properly funded programmes of technical assistance. We know what their needs are and that they are many and various. And the sources of funds will certainly be numerous in view of the lofty aims of the programmes. We hope that the only obstacle, namely the determination of the Israeli occupation authorities to prevent execution of these humanitarian programmes, will disappear and that those authorities will bend to the will of the international community, in particular by complying with the resolutions of this Conference.

I should like to say by way of conclusion that while we are meeting here the Palestinian people are being subjected to a barbarous and unjust economic blockade which contravenes all regulations and is incompatible with international humanitarian values. The blockade has been in force for months, although the Conference on Human Rights is to be opened next week in Vienna. The delegations concerned are preparing to continue their negotiations there. It would therefore be appropriate for this Conference, which represents the world's social conscience, to appeal to the Israeli occupation authorities to end the iniquitous blockade so that the Palestinian workers and people can live their daily lives in peace and security.

Mr. FARAG (representative of the Organization of African Unity) – At the outset, allow me to express our congratulations to the Director-General and his representatives who prepared the excellent Report under discussion. In preparing this report, the representatives of the Director-General were guided by the principles and objectives laid down in the Constitution of the ILO, including the Declaration of Philadelphia, and also by the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination in employment and occupation. They have carried out their mission during an extremely difficult and tense period, when curfews were imposed, people were being killed on both sides and violence was increasing.

Once more the Organization of African Unity (OAU) would like to reiterate its full support to the Palestinian people and their legitimate leadership, the PLO, in their lawful struggle for independence and the establishment of their own free State; as well as to the liberation movements in South Africa, in their struggles towards a democratic and non-discriminatory society. The OAU also lends its support to all repressed people throughout the world in their struggle for independence and the right to freedom and liberty.

The Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the OAU and the OAU Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, as well as the African Ministers of Labour, regularly adopt relevant resolutions on the question of South Africa and Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, particularly on the situation of their workers and peoples.

Examining the report in question, it is evident that the continuing state of occupation of more than a quarter of a century has led to the continuous deterioration of the working conditions of Palestinian workers and the trade union situation and has had an adverse effect on employment levels. This state of occupation has weakened the economy, shaken the labour market and hampered economic development through the demolition of Palestinian homes by anti-tank missiles, the imposition of curfews, low wages, uncertainty of contracts, absence of social protection and social security, the killing of workers and others, closure of educational institutions and so forth – as mentioned in the report.

Having mentioned all these factors, which have been the natural result of occupation, I am confident that no one in this august assembly expects any improvement or tangible development in the working conditions of Palestinian workers. No doubt that under such wretched conditions, a homeless, jobless, poor and hungry man who lived under occupation would feel bound to resort to violence and killing.

Let us think aloud. What do we expect from such a person who lives under occupation and witnesses every day the killing of his family members and imprisonment of his sisters and brothers? I wager that he or she would not continue to be an angel. This is human nature.

Another factor which has a direct effect on the lives of Arab workers is the establishment of Israeli settlements in the occupied Arab territories, which is the main reason for the current tension and violent acts described in the report. Unfortunately, the policy of establishing settlements continues, in spite of the Security Council resolution unanimously adopted in 1979 which considered that this policy had no legal validity and constituted a serious obstruction to achieving comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

For its part, the International Labour Conference in 1980 expressed its concern and even called for the dismantling of existing settlements.

I believe our duty in this forum is to call upon the Israeli authorities to immediately put an end to this policy since it is a source of tension and violence; and we are looking for peace and security.

Turning to the point on technical cooperation, I would like to pay tribute to the ILO for the efforts it has made in strengthening the economic and technical capabilities of the Arab workers and citizens in Palestine and the occupied territories, in spite of the insignificant amount of money allocated to projects for the 1992-93 biennium. The implementation of ILO programmes, in collaboration with UNDP and UNRWA, also deserve appreciation, particularly in the fields of trade unions' and employers' training, workers' education, vocational rehabilitation and the placement of the handicapped. Yet, these activities should be increased and intensified to meet the real needs of the population.

We also believe, in the same way as the ILO, that democracy in society can only be strengthened by the existence of strong and independent social institutions – in particular, workers' and employers' organizations – which participate actively in the formulation of economic and social policy. And if Israel itself accepts this principle, why should it deny it for others?

Another point mentioned in the report to which I would like to draw the attention of the assembly is that there are thousands of Palestinian workers continuing to work in Israel without work permits – a situation that leaves them without any social benefits and exposes them to the worst form of exploitation. Even those who work with work permits do not receive all the benefits that should accrue from the social insurance contributions that are automatically deducted from their wages.

With regard to the occupied Golan Heights, the report concludes that there has been no improvement in the situation of the population there, who continue to be subjected to restrictions on access to water, confiscation of land, the expansion of settlements and the restrictions on the export of local products. In addition, they continue to be subjected to the Israeli imposition of educational and cultural norms. We strongly believe that this is unacceptable and that the Israeli authorities should immediately review its policy and allow the population freely to develop its economic activity and pursue its cultural and educational activities without interference, as has been mentioned in the report.

In conclusion, and in the name of the OAU and its 52 member States, I would like to call upon the Israeli authorities to stop immediately the demolition of homes, the arrest and killing of Palestinians, the establishment of settlements and the policy of deportation; I would also like to urge them to put an end to the military occupation, confiscation and annexation of land. This would result in the end of violent acts and killing of Israeli soldiers and settlers by Palestinians. It would undoubtedly pave the way for the peace talks; talks which, we hope, will reach satisfactory conclusions to all parties concerned and ensure that peace and security prevail in this explosive part of the world. We would also like to support the idea of setting up a Conference committee for the consideration and discussion of this report.

Mr. ZAKARIA (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – Let me first of all join all those who have congratulated the President on his election to the Chair of this session. The fact that our work has proceeded very smoothly justifies the confidence of all those who voted for him.

This is the fourth time we meet here to examine the plight of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories and in Palestine and each year the picture becomes darker.

The killing goes on, deportation goes on, repression goes on and there is no move nearer to the application of any of the resolutions of the United Nations. But there are still some speakers here at the Conference who express the hope that this will be the last special sitting. Yes, we all hope it will be the last special sitting but everything depends on the two Governments of those who spoke here and protested against the continuation of this special session. This special session could stop tomorrow if tomorrow Israel withdrew from the Palestinian territories, withdrew from the Golan Heights, gave South Lebanon to its people and stopped its aggression against neighbouring countries. But as long as all these acts of aggression continue our action and our demand for action by the ILO will continue. We were also told that the ILO should not single out one State and make it a subject of discussion in a special session. But the ILO did this in the past. Some years back the ILO singled out the racist regime in Pretoria and continued its action until it compelled the administration of that regime to cease its membership with the ILO.

The ILO is asked not only to stop such sessions, not only to discontinue to deal with this important issue but to refrain from any action to support the legitimate rights of the Palestinian workers and people to live in peace and in justice.

My organization, the World Federation of Trade Unions, fully supports the five proposals made this morning by the representative of Palestine, and in particular the creation of a Conference committee to examine the question of the conditions of the workers in Palestine and the occupied territories. I take this opportunity to express once more our complete solidarity with the struggle of the Palestinian people and workers and our readiness to support that struggle by all the means at our disposal.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – On behalf of the World Confederation of Labour, we would like to pay tribute to the importance of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The Government representative of Israel is quite right in saying that we all wish no longer to have to hold this type of session. But this depends solely upon his Government: it is only necessary to apply Resolutions 242 and 338 of the Security Council of the United Nations which recognize the legitimate rights to self-determination of the Palestinian people, and require Israel to abandon to the occupied territories; then this session would not be needed. We ask the Government of Israel to take the responsibility of ending occupation of the Arab territories. There is no other solution.

We would like to express our wish that there should be a genuine political will to see that discussions for peace do progress. The United Nations should also be careful to apply fair measures and to ensure that the Resolutions concerning Palestine are applied with the same criteria as those applied to other countries.

It is certain that this problem is political in nature, but there are also serious social consequences. The Director-General's Report describes, among other aspects, a series of serious violations of union rights in the occupied Arab territories.

We would like to congratulate and express our solidarity with the Palestinian Trade Unions Federation and in particular would like to support their request for a permanent ILO committee for Palestine to be set up and for the International Labour Office to strengthen its cooperation by the presence of a multidisciplinary team or at least one official from the Organization to help technical cooperation to move forward.

The World Confederation of Labour will continue to emphasize in every way that the only solution to the problem of the Middle East is for the occupied territories to be given up and for the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people to be recognized and we trust that a genuine and constructive dialogue will take place which will respect all the peoples of the region. ILO must continue its efforts to collaborate towards this objective.

Original Russian: Mr. KANAEV (representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions) – First of all I should like to associate myself with preceding speakers in congratulating the President, on his election to this honourable and responsible post.

The holding of a special sitting of the Conference on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories is now becoming a tradition in our Organization. It once again reaffirms the Organization's commitment to its fundamental principle "that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

We would like to express satisfaction at the very high quality and conscientious work done by the members of the ILO special mission who have once again gone to study the situation of the Arab workers and have presented us with an objective and convincing report on this topical and, I would say, vitally important question.

We must never forget one of the provisions of the ILO Constitution, namely, that the denial of rights and poverty, wherever they appear, are damaging to world progress and welfare.

Unfortunately, the situation in the occupied Arab territories continues to be tense. Recent attempts to regulate the issue through negotiations and dialogue have not yet produced the desired results. The blood of innocent people continues to be shed. There is continuing discrimination against the Arab population. There is harassment and persecution.

The most flagrant fact in this regard was the deportation of Palestinians into no-man's land where they continue to live in truly inhuman conditions.

All of this must necessarily arouse deep concern among all workers and trade union members. The trade unions of our countries who have known the bitterness of inter-ethnic conflicts that have brought bloodshed and misery to millions of people feel particularly keenly for the sufferings of their Arab brothers and express their full solidarity and support in their struggle for national self-determination, the exercise of human rights and decent living conditions.

Contempt for the demands of world public opinion and the flouting of the standards of international law are leading to an infringement of resolutions of the United Nations and the ILO and cannot but arouse feelings of protest and serious concern.

In this connection, it must be recognized that the opening in Washington recently of the ninth round of the Middle East peace talks has failed to clarify the situation and has not produced the desired result. Workers and trade unions, as well as world opinion in general, are entitled to hope that the new Government in Israel will be able to take a more realistic view of the possibility of a Middle East peace settlement. In any event, we venture to hope so, on the basis of the most recent assurances that Israel is prepared to take as a basis for negotiations, Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 which, as is known, call for the withdrawal from the occupied territories.

The just cause of the Arab peoples, first of all of the working people – the people of Palestine – enjoys the deep sympathy and support of all the member organizations of the General Confederation of Trade Unions. We entirely support the objective of an early and peaceful settlement of the Middle East crisis and of the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the region. We trust that Histadrut, too, will make its contribution to this noble objective which is clearly to find a peaceful and just settlement to the question.

We intend to continue to display solidarity with the just and courageous struggle of the Arab workers, with their determination to insist on a decent future for themselves and to secure the return of the homeland which was taken away from them. This struggle has won the deep sympathy and respect of the trade unions and workers that belong to the GCTU.

We, the representatives of the General Confederation of Trade Unions consider that the ILO must continue to intensify its activity aimed at supporting the legitimate rights and interests of the workers and the people of Palestine, securing an end to the policy of discrimination against workers pursued by Israel and the violation of their trade union rights and freedoms. The conclusions and proposals in the report of the special ILO mission can serve as a good basis for those efforts.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! One year follows another and the conditions in the occupied Arab territories in Palestine, the Golan and southern Lebanon continue to deteriorate. The number of expelled, killed and arrested is on the rise. Injustice and oppression increase. Workers are suffering unemployment and trade unionists are being oppressed. Trade union headquarters are being ransacked. All this because the Israeli occupation authorities refuse to recognize the legitimate rights of the Arab people and the Palestinian people to their homeland. They continue to reject and violate international resolutions and decisions by occupying the Syrian Golan Heights and southern Lebanon.

Such a situation would not have continued had not Israel received support from Western countries, had it not been for the existence of dual international standards and the refusal to recognize human rights and the legitimate rights of people to self-determination.

The Director-General's Report has revealed to what extent the living, social, economic and human conditions of the workers and people of Palestine have deteriorated. The report states that military occupation makes it impossible to freely exercise those freedoms upheld and recognized by the ILO. The original inhabitants do not take part in decision-making – especially those decisions affecting their social and economic development. Such decisions are being taken by the military administrators of Israel whose motivations contradict the interests of the Palestinian people. The report reaffirms that the harsh conditions of the Arab workers and the treatment of such workers by the military authorities place such workers in an undignified situation and a discriminatory one. The report also refers to the blackmail and unfair treatment of the workers in Gaza, as the Arab workers in Gaza only receive a small share of their social security. This amounts to 0.95 per cent of their entitlements. Is this not evidence of premeditated violation of international laws and the legitimization of looting and robbery?

Is not the Israeli policy of expulsion of Arab workers – the expulsion of more than 400 workers and citizens from various social strata who continue to be homeless – a violation of international laws? Israel refuses to implement United Nations Security Council resolution 799 (1992). Israeli practices are being continued in all their harshness. No day passes without some information in the news about the oppression and the beatings suffered by the Palestinians, the ransacking of their homes, the undignified treatment inflicted upon them, as well as the killings. How many times have Gaza and the territories been put under curfew? How many times have the occupation authorities killed women and children and old people simply for taking part in demonstrations and calling for their right, independence and peace? As far as the occupied Syrian Golan is concerned, the illegal settlement situation must end. The international community must call on Israel not to undermine the cultural heritage of the territories. They must cease their economic activities. They must cease to expropriate agricultural land and to establish settlements at the expense of the original inhabitants. We must condemn the repeated aggression against southern Lebanon.

We wish to thank the ILO mission for the efforts it has undertaken and for its objectivity and the manner in which it has gathered its information; nevertheless, we find that errors have been committed because of the use of certain expressions which are not admitted and acceptable internationally. We wish to reaffirm our support for the Palestinian people and the nation. We wish to express our support for the establishment of a Palestinian nation on its own territory with its own capital, Jerusalem, and with its legitimate representative, the PLO, within and outside the territories. We wish to reaffirm our conviction that the International Labour Organization can play an important role and that the International Labour Office must seek to alleviate the suffering of the Arab workers in Palestine by providing assistance and establishing comprehensive programmes for technical cooperation and appointing a resident representative in the territories to supervise the implementation of such reports. That representative could be the link between the ILO and Palestinian workers. We wish equally to reaffirm that the establishment of a special Conference committee to examine the report and comment on it would have an important impact on the present efforts to uphold the rights of the Palestinian people, as well as those of the inhabitants of the other Arab occupied territories.

We wish from this rostrum to greet the children of the noble Palestinian intifada. We hope that victory will come soon.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative of the World Movement of Christian Workers) – I thank the World Movement of Christian Workers for giving Pax Christi International the opportunity to speak on the 16th report concerning the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. It is heartening that the representatives of the Director-General feel that they were able to do their job with the full cooperation and participation of all the parties concerned, both Israeli and Palestinian.

This confidence vis-à-vis the ILO is certainly flattering to our Organization, but it may well prove vain if the recommendations that are adopted year after year – and this has been the case for 16 years now – receive so little follow up. This special session is drawing the attention of the world to a situation which unfortunately shows little signs of change.

In its last Report, the Office suggested, and I quote: "...that it may now be timely to consider additional ways through which a more direct dialogue could be established between the parties involved..." and indicated that the "...ILO would welcome any overtures, and in particular from the Israeli Government, which might result in the establishment of a mechanism... whose mandate would be to seek solutions to the social and labour problems evoked in this report".

These problems are numerous indeed, and often dramatic in their impact on workers and their families. In order to resolve them, shouldn't we be quite clear in our minds about the standards that are applicable? In terms of law, the Israeli administration appears to be playing as it sees fit on Egyptian legislation in Gaza, Jordanian legislation in the West Bank, Syrian legislation in the Golan, while sometimes making reference to the regulations of the British colonial administration or even to those of the Ottoman Empire. As if that were not enough, to this it adds the decrees of the Military Administration. Any decision thus finds a legal reference justifying measures which in fact are extremely arbitrary. As concerns ILO Conventions, the situation is so vague that this year again no mention is made concerning Israel in the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, as if nothing gave grounds for complaint. On this subject, we might recall the curious decision taken by the ILO Governing Body in 1986 and contained in document GB.233/16/30: "The occupation by Israel of Arab territories in 1967 cannot be considered as having extended to the occupied territories Israel's obligations under Conventions it has ratified, and secondly that actions taken by Israel in the occupied territories cannot be considered as having taken place 'within its jurisdiction' for the purposes of the procedure for the examination of representations under article 24 of the Constitution and the Standing Orders relating thereto." I don't know whether the Palestinian trade unions will be in a position to put forward representations or complaints to the ILO. I hope that the ILO, through its technical cooperation, can help them to do so. Furthermore, the Palestinians discriminated against because of their origin are unable to make claims under Convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in employment. For that purpose, they would have to be able to claim a national origin which they still do not enjoy under international law. As concerns trade union law, the Palestinians working in Israel have to make a mandatory contribution to the Histadrut Union which does not, however, make them members of the union. Neither can they be members of the Palestinian union which has no competence to act in Israel. The Israeli association "Workers' Hotline", which, with great dedication and effectiveness, defends the workers' interests, receives none of those contributions, the deduction of which is mandatory. Another inequality is that the social contributions deducted from the wages of Palestinians working in Israel do not entitle them to the same benefits as the workers residing in the country. The representatives of the Director-General could only conclude, and I quote, that "there is not a country in the world that excludes such a high number of workers living outside its territory from full social protection which is paid for by the workers and employers...".

Last year, Pax Christi International expressed the hope from this rostrum that the Governing Body would take the initiative of suggesting a tripartite meeting to examine the conditions of the application of ILO standards in the Israeli occupied territories. We must note that this suggestion is still quite relevant.

This is not an academic question. The Report which is before us abounds in examples of unequal treatment, intolerable harassment and inexplicable vexations visited upon Palestinian workers. Security, which is the legitimate concern of any State, is in Israel the expression of an obsessive pathology rooted in history, but the root is certainly not Palestinian. Anti-semitism in Europe did not begin with the Second World War. It has always been more constant and more cruel too than in the Middle East. It would be a serious mistake to make the Palestinians pay for this, provoking them through the harshness of the military occupation to revolt and to regrettable acts of despair. The sealing of the frontier causes a daily loss of US$2.5 million to the workers of Palestine, whose economy is in any case under Israeli tutelage. The peoples of the Holy Land are historically called upon to live together in mutual respect for their differences. Should not Jerusalem become for the entire world a symbol of peace rather than of division and hatred?

Allow me, to conclude by expressing a hope: A couple in Gaza lost their 18-month-old child playing outside their house a few weeks ago, shot dead. May this blood, so unjustly shed – the blood of an innocent victim – may it awaken the world's conscience.

Original Spanish: Mr. GOMEZ (representative of Latin American Central of Workers) – Like previous speakers, it is my pleasure to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election. I also congratulate the Director-General of the Organization for his re-election. I wish him success in all his efforts.

Once again we take the floor with great concern in this special sitting on the situation of Palestinian workers in the occupied territories. The holding of this special sitting and the Director-General's 16th report on the serious situation which affects hundreds of thousands of workers, demonstrate that there is a clear lack of political will in certain States to solve the problem.

Once again, the Director-General's Report denounces the lamentable conditions to which the Palestinian workers are subject.

Once again, the Director-General in his recommendations calls for objectivity and justice – two key elements to solve this problem. But we do not find any hint of these elements in the attitudes of those who could solve this problem. It is sufficient to compare the quick reaction of certain States in declaring the so-called Gulf war with the lethargy which always seems to surround the first resolution adopted by the United Nations in 1964 concerning the occupied territories.

We can only condemn the recent flare-up of acts of violence which are motivated, inter alia, by a military occupation which makes it impossible for the Palestinian people to enjoy the basic civil and political liberties and human rights which have been formally recognized by the States concerned.

The reprehensible exploitation of Arab workers in Israel, the degrading treatment suffered by Palestinian workers, the systematic repression of any action undertaken by the workers, which is immediately considered as subversive, and, finally, the creation and expansion of Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, all of which are described in the Director-General's Report, cry out for viable and just solutions for this lamentable situation.

Once again, the CLAT reaffirms its most active solidarity with the workers and the people of Palestine, and with the indisputable and inalienable right to live in peace, freedom and justice in their own sovereign State.

Hence we support the proposal to set up a special committee, to reinforce the ILO's cooperation, in particular by appointing a special official to operate within these occupied territories, and to promote by all possible means an effective dialogue to facilitate a political, popular, and democratic solution, for the benefit of the workers and people of Palestine.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Khalil, Minister of Social Affairs and Labour of the Syrian Arab Republic for a right of reply.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – I have asked for the floor to exercise my right of reply to reply to Mr. Otero, Government delegate, United States, and another representative who questioned the reason why the Arab Labour Organization did not reply to the allegations of the violations and deprivation of the rights of workers.

I should like to say that the Arab group is aware of the ILO machinery and respects the rules and is bound by them, but the reason that it did not have recourse to that machinery is the following.

The monitoring of the situation and conditions of Palestinian workers in the Arab occupied territories is undertaken by other ILO departments in accordance with the Constitution of the ILO, and in accordance with the resolutions adopted in 1984. You are well aware of these provisions which are binding on all member States of the ILO.

Accordingly, we believe that recourse to this machinery would transcend the ILO Conference resolutions and would be contradictory to the procedures of work of the various ILO departments, particularly since the Director-General sends a yearly mission to observe the situation in the occupied Arab territories.

Here I should like to ask whether the facts which are referred to in the mission report have been properly dealt with.

Secondly, I believe that it is the Israeli authorities who have violated trade union rights and here I should like to refer to the various complaints against the Israeli authorities. The Israeli authorities did not heed the recommendations, and have violated them. This is an indication of the continuing violation, as is the Director-General's Report for this year, and I should like to refer you to paragraph 98 of that Report.

Thirdly, various claims have been submitted under article 24 of the Constitution, the last of which was in 1986, and the reply of the Director-General was clear, namely that the occupation by Israel of Arab territories in 1967 could not be considered as an acquired right of Israel.

The Legal Adviser believes that this would apply to other cases under article 26 of the Constitution. Here we should like to ask whether there are other means available for us to convey our claims and views to the ILO, and I here should like to draw the attention of the delegate of the United States.

Furthermore, those who attended the 1977 Session of the International Labour Conference will realize that in accordance with the international law, the ILO cannot seek to implement these principles by force.

Fourthly, on the basis of international labour standards and laws, the citizens of a single State should enjoy equal rights, except in certain unusual and extraordinary conditions, and we believe that such cases should be dealt with individually since they run counter to the usual conditions observed in member States of the Organization.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In concluding this special sitting I should like to express to you my sincere gratitude and appreciation for the atmosphere that prevailed in this sitting, characterized by mutual respect and understanding. This is what we had all been hoping for, and that is why I should like in all sincerity to express my appreciation and gratitude to all the speakers who have contributed to this special sitting and to all the groups and organizations they represent.

We come now to the end of the special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. I do not intend at this late hour to sum up this rich exchange of views, but I am certain that the Director-General of the ILO will draw many conclusions from your statements which will help him, in consultation with the Governing Body, to lay down future plans concerning this important question. It is fitting to reiterate what was mentioned by many speakers, namely that it is essential for the ILO to continue to play an important role, to provide a forum for dialogue on this important issue, to consolidate this role through an integrated programme of technical cooperation for the occupied Arab territories, and to continue to seek the elimination of obstacles to a lasting and comprehensive peace.

Once more I should like to thank you, and on your behalf I should like to thank the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne and the ILO mission, led by Mr. William Simpson, for this excellent report.

In conclusion I can only reiterate what was mentioned by the Director-General in his Report, and which was further reiterated by several speakers, namely, that the only way for the future is to put an end to the military occupation, and to respect human rights. That is why we hope that the peace process will be crowned with success, so that all peoples of the region may live in peace. It is only then that we will no longer need a special sitting.

The time has indeed come for a direct dialogue involving all the parties concerned, through a forum for dialogue under the auspices of the ILO that would parallel the current peace talks and negotiations which are under way at the diplomatic and political level.

I should like to associate myself with the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who for the second successive year has called for our Organization to serve as such a forum.

I declare this special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories closed.

The peace and the blessings of God be upon you.

Fourteenth sitting

Friday, 11 June 1993, 10.00 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Abdel-Hak and Mr. Bustos Huerta

RATIFICATION OF A CONVENTION BY MEXICO

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Before we begin with the items on this morning's agenda, I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to inform us of the ratification of an international labour Convention.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification, by Mexico, of the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,742.

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The first item on this morning's agenda is the sixth report of the Selection Committee (which appears in Provisional Record No. 5E). This report deals only with changes in the composition of committees and is submitted for adoption. If there are no objections, I shall consider it duly adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The second item on our agenda concerns the first report of the Credentials Committee (published in Provisional Record No. 10). I give the floor to Mr. Ausman, Government delegate of Canada, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. AUSMAN (Government delegate, Canada; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour today to present the first report of the Credentials Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 10.

The report sets out the position with regard to the composition of the Conference, as well as the quorum, as it was on 7 June when it was adopted by the Committee.

In the meantime, Eritrea has been admitted to membership in the Organization and has accredited a tripartite delegation. São Tome and Principe has also accredited a delegation, bringing the number of member States present at the Conference to 153. This number does not include Zaire, for which communications appointing delegates and advisers to the Conference were received from different sources. This matter is still being considered by the Committee.

The report also sets out the position with regard to incomplete delegations and results as regards the right to vote.

Since the adoption of the report Afghanistan has accredited a complete tripartite delegation and Guinea and Romania have regained their right to vote.

The delegations of five countries – Ethiopia, Equatorial Guinea, Liberia, Somalia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia – are exclusively governmental.

Five countries – Albania, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and the Lao People's Democratic Republic – have not accredited an Employers' delegate, while one country, Guatemala, has not accredited a Workers' delegate.

The Committee wishes to remind Governments of their obligation to comply with the requirements of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference, and once again urges Governments, when nominating delegations, to have due regard for an appropriate proportion in the tripartite composition of the Conference, as envisaged in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution.

The Committee reminds member States of their obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of this session of the Conference.

I should like to draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 8 of the report concerning the number of women among accredited delegates and advisers further to the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1981.

The Committee would like to underline that credentials should be sent to the Office within the time-limit laid down in article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and that the appropriate form should be used, which is attached to the memorandum sent to governments before this session of the Conference. It is also particularly important that governments provide precise information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted concerning the appointment of Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers, as well as information on the organizations which have agreed to such appointments.

As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

(The report is noted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The third item on our agenda is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original Portuguese: Mr. SILVA PENEDA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) – First of all I would like, on behalf of my Government and the Portuguese delegation, and on my own behalf, to congratulate Mr Abdel-Hak very warmly for his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

Social protection originated in the world of labour because only wage-earners enjoyed certain rights within the framework of a limited degree of solidarity between them and their employers. Gradually, the scope of social insurance was extended to cover self-employed workers as well. In view of this classical concept of the labour link, rigorous restrictions limited the number of people who were protected as well as the number of contingencies and the benefits were determined by applying rigid actuarial calculations.

In the thirties and forties, however, ideological trends in some countries led to a growing intervention on the part of the State in social and economic fields which, together with international cooperation, fostered the progressive transformation of the earlier social insurance schemes into true systems of social security.

We should recall the contribution of the ILO which, beginning with the provisions contained in the Preamble to its Constitution of 1919, has adopted a number of international standards in order to provide guidelines for the establishment of comprehensive social security systems.

Thanks to these developments, most economically developed countries introduced social security schemes based on the principle of universality, with coverage gradually extended to almost the whole population.

Most of the developing countries have much more recent social security schemes, patterned on those of the former colonial Powers. This is especially true in Africa. In most of these countries it proved impossible to go beyond the strict limits of social insurance; therefore, the scope of such schemes tends to be restricted to civil servants and to wage-earners in the formal or modern economy.

Since the mid 1970s social security schemes began to face a variety of difficulties, owing to a general stagnation in economic growth. These new conditions had severe effects on the advanced countries, in particular, where social protection costs rose on average to 25 per cent of GDP in 1975. This was due to several factors: a deterioration of the contributor/beneficiary ratio, which fell from 7.5 in 1960 to 5.4 in 1990, the growth of medical care costs, which represent on average 8 per cent of GDP, and the enormous rise in unemployment.

The financial difficulties experienced by the economically more developed countries as regards their social security schemes are even more acute in the developing countries.

It is true that many of these countries are carrying out programmes of economic stabilization or structural adjustment; in some cases the long-term success of these programmes may depend on a short-run cut in the social security costs.

Given the present and future challenges to social security schemes, all countries, both industrialized and developing, will have to recognize the need to undertake major reforms in these schemes. This is a concern which is shared by politicians, social partners and researchers.

From the instrumental point of view, the above-mentioned reforms may be divided into four major groups: institutional, technical, financial and administrative.

The wise observations made by the Director-General of the ILO, Mr Michel Hansenne, in the excellent Report prepared for this session of the International Labour Conference, point repeatedly to the urgent need for such reforms within a framework which is consonant with the typology which I have just suggested.

Considering the flagrant asymmetries in the levels of development of social security schemes in different parts of the world, particularly between the industrialized countries and developing countries, it is urgent to establish a strategy which, in addition to bridging the existing gaps, will enable social security to become a decisive factor of political stability, justice, welfare, human resources development and social progress.

In line with the strategic objectives set forth in the Report of the Director-General, the Government of my country, which I have the honour to represent here, has in recent years deployed considerable efforts and taken initiatives which at the qualitative level have made it possible for social security schemes in Portugal to achieve the average level of schemes in the advanced countries. However, we are aware that, in close association with economic advances, we must continue and step up our efforts and give priority attention to the quantitive improvement of cash benefits, particularly pensions.

Finally, we must also bear in mind the importance of the timely observation by the Pope that development is the new name for peace. I have pleasure therefore in stating that the Portuguese Government, in response to clear ethical and political imperatives, has not shunned its responsibilities in the field of international cooperation in general, and cooperation with Portuguese-speaking African countries, in particular. In recent years, and in full respect of the ethical principals and values which should guide all forms of cooperation between peoples and sovereign nations, the Portuguese Government and the Governments of these countries have taken decisions which have led to an unprecedented extension of cooperation. This cooperation has been further increased and diversified in specific areas, particularly as regards social security.

In the final analysis, there is a clear mutual recognition that solidarity is more than a simple awareness of interdependence between peoples linked by profound fraternal, historic and cultural ties. The essential objective is to translate the discourse and culture of solidarity between peoples who are the masters of their own destiny into a permanent moral attitude in terms of fraternal and just relations.

Our will is to promote the development of all peoples.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-DERHEM (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Housing, Qatar) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have pleasure in presenting to you first of all the compliments of Sheikh Khalifa Ben Hamad Al-Thani, the Emir of the State of Qatar, and his best wishes for the success of this session of the Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this session to guide its proceedings. Congratulations also to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, on his re-election.

In his Report, the Director-General deals with the question of social insurance and social protection, which is of great interest to all of us – governments, employers and employees. We are aware of the forward-looking and humanitarian dimensions of all the questions raised in the Report with a view to ensuring a better life for all peoples. This approach reflects the commitment of the International Labour Organization to the principles and goals for which it was founded and affirms its renewed understanding of the content of those goals in the light of international economic and social developments.

The Report presents an overview of the creation, development and present state of social insurance and social protection in the developed and developing countries, shedding light on the difficulties and problems facing such schemes in these two groups of countries. We found this review particularly useful since we are currently in the process of developing a modern social insurance scheme and are naturally keen to avoid the difficulties that others have encountered. Although we have learned from our own experience in the area of social insurance and protection, we wish to take advantage of modern techniques and more advanced methods of administration and funding in the context of appropriate structures.

Our approach to social protection is based on the principles of our religion with respect to cooperation for well-being, solidarity to combat want and help for the needy, given concrete form in the enlightened policy of our leadership, which feels responsible for the protection of all citizens from the cradle to the grave.

With regard to employment and enterprises, the responsibility of employers in cases of sickness, accident, disability or death is determined by labour law. Generally speaking, social security legislation provides for monthly financial assistance for needy groups, including old people, widows, orphans and the handicapped. In addition, the State provides free housing for the needy and cheap housing for low-income groups. Beneficiaries are given plots of land free of charge to build low-cost housing and are offered interest-free loans repayable on a monthly basis over a period varying from 20 to 25 years. Only 60 per cent of the total is repayable and no further instalments are payable in the event of the death or incapacitation of the beneficiary. The State also provides free plots and easy interest-free loans for home-building to senior public-sector employees. All these measures form part of a policy designed to provide proper housing for all. Furthermore, the State provides preventive and therapeutic health care free of charge for all members of the population, including physiotherapy and prostheses for accident victims or the disabled. Education is also free at all levels, including technical and vocational education. In addition, the State seeks to develop the abilities of persons receiving assistance through training and access to appropriate employment. Vocational training and social adjustment centres have been set up for women to provide them with the skills they need to find appropriate employment, thus improving their material situation and the well-being of their families. The State has also taken steps to revive traditional industries and crafts for old people as a way of improving their material and social situation and their state of mind, and so that those who have something to contribute can do so to the best of their ability and in complete freedom.

The Director-General has spoken of the factors which have caused a sharp rise in social security costs and the concomitant increase in contributions imposed on institutions and governments. The situation requires that new mechanisms be found to provide social protection. We thank God that social security in our country is part and parcel of our fundamental creed and of our way of life. It has historical, cultural and social dimensions and is based on the various social entities and society in general. We believe that this sentiment, which is profoundly rooted in the social fabric, is the very basis of society; we must therefore endeavour to strengthen and develop whatever it produces, in terms of associations and activities.

The State tries to grant all the facilities and assistance needed by voluntary organizations and to promote diversification of their activities in areas such as education and training, as well as traditional activities in the social sphere.

The International Labour Organization, through technical assistance, could make a greater contribution to improving the working methods of these bodies, their structure and management to enable them to discharge their responsibilities as effectively as possible.

The Director-General has also spoken of the difficulties faced by developing countries and their inability to develop effective systems of social protection. The fundamental problem of many developing countries is the lack of material resources and the human resources which could allow them to make use of the material resources and develop a healthy and stable economic base for programmes in line with their requirements. Consequently, these countries require qualitative assistance in solving their fundamental problems by establishing economic rules which will help them to meet their own requirements, reduce their growing deficits and break the vicious cycle of poverty and underdevelopment.

We would like from this rostrum to mention the role of the International Labour Organization in the field of technical cooperation, a topic which is also on our agenda. We accept the sincere desire of the Director-General to enhance this assistance, both qualitatively and quantitatively, to developing countries. We are also aware of the difficulties faced by this Organization, given its limited resources and the vast scale of the problems. Nevertheless, the ILO could call on the international community to do more to solve these problems as part of a global plan based on assistance and solidarity. This is what the developing countries understand by the new world order: a world free from wars and conflicts, whose resources are devoted to peaceful projects which allow human beings to live in harmony, peace, security and fraternity.

We would like in particular to underline the need to improve the technical cooperation programmes in the Arab countries on a regional and bilateral basis, in line with their requirements and needs. We also hope that greater attention and support will be given to our Arab brothers in the occupied territories in view of the particular conditions in which they have to live.

Allow me to take this opportunity to reaffirm once again our sincere hope for a swift and successful outcome to the Middle East peace negotiation, so that the people of the region may live in security and devote all their efforts to development. We hope that greater efforts will be made to reach a settlement guaranteeing a just and lasting peace, liberty, dignity and sovereignty, so that they may manage their own affairs and obtain their noble objectives.

In conclusion, I would like to thank all those who supported the candidature of Qatar in the election. I would like to thank the Director-General for his excellent Report and wish him and this Conference every success.

Original French: Mr. MATINCHEV (Deputy Prime Minister, Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Bulgaria) – I would first like to congratulate the President on his election. Like all the participants in the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, including the newly admitted member States of the Organization, I should like to wish him every success.

I would also like to seize this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to a second term as Director-General of the International Labour Office.

At the beginning of my statement I would like to express the importance which the Republic of Bulgaria attaches to the principles which inspire the ILO in the course of its work: the implementation of basic human rights, the aspiration to social justice, the expansion of tripartite cooperation as a means to ensure democratic participation of the social partners in the establishment and implementation of social policy.

On the eve of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia, we, the participants in this session of the Conference, have reiterated our confidence in the ILO and in its role in carrying out social changes and democratic reforms in the member States.

We would like to express the hope that the new multilateral relations that have been evolving under the auspices of the United Nations will retain the deeply rooted traditions and values of the ILO. In this respect, I would like to associate myself with the assessments expressed so far in the discussion of the Director-General's Report dealing with Social insurance and social protection issues.

The search for new ways to promote further the democratic process will determine the ILO's new role and significance not only for the present time but also for the long term.

Bulgaria is been undergoing the transition to a market economy in extremely adverse economic conditions. At the end of the year of 1992 the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) had dropped by 26 per cent as compared to 1989. The level of industrial production decreased by 47 per cent. Significant losses have also been incurred by our country – amounting to $200 million per month – following the strict adherence to the United Nations resolution imposing an embargo against the former Yugoslavia, as well as losses resulting from the sanctions imposed on Iraq and Libya.

I am sure that the international community will help our Government to overcome the adverse effects of these enormous losses and that it will also contribute to easing social tensions inside my country.

The serious deterioration in the standard of living of the Bulgarian people caused by the severe economic crisis requires that the efforts of the Government which I represent be directed principally towards the protection of the actual income of the population from the disastrous effects of inflation; stabilization of this income at the 1992 level in spite of a further deterioration of production levels; new orientation of social protection nets directed to target the most vulnerable levels of the population.

We attach great importance to radical reform in the areas of social protection and social assistance, where we have been meeting with very serious difficulties. First of all, we had to establish a safety net for the poor. A social assistance law was presented to Parliament which was tailored to fit the needs of those whose needs were greatest.

Owing to the weaknesses of the system we have inherited, we have a very low retirement age. There is very little participation in old-age insurance schemes.

The number of retirees in Bulgaria has risen considerably: the employed to retirees ratio runs at 100:85.

We have been working for several years to prepare a new draft social security plan which, after discussions between the social partners and government will be presented to Parliament for adoption, setting out the basic principles, strategy and tactics for reform, on this basis, we shall draw up a new social security law and a law on sickness insurance.

The separation of the Social Security Fund from the State's budget and the setting up of an insurance institution will be submitted to Parliament, to be the basis for institutional reforms.

Our aim is to draw up a new system which respects the fundamental right of the people to social security and will be a measure for social development.

Bearing in mind our experience, we shall also make every effort to build up a feasible and fiscally affordable system that will efficiently utilize its resources and operate on a basis of minimum fiscal funds while retaining its transparency. In this respect the role of the State and of market mechanisms is also being reconsidered.

To this effect, we shall rely on technical cooperation and assistance from the ILO and from the newly established Budapest-based multidisciplinary team for Central and Eastern Europe, with which we have maintained a close working relationship. In view of the forthcoming ratification by Bulgaria of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), we will need the assistance of ILO experts to modify our own national legislation.

I would like again to thank the ILO for its active partnership policy. We hope that our future cooperation with the ILO will be effective, and that the ILO will help us in accelerating the process of transition towards a market economy and towards democracy.

Original Japanese: Mrs. SHIMIZU (Parliamentary Vice-Minister of Labour, Japan) – I should first like to offer the President, on behalf of the Government of Japan, my most sincere congratulations on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to offer Mr. Hansenne my warmest congratulations on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office.

Let me also welcome most warmly the representatives of the States attending this Conference for the first time.

I should first like to make a few remarks concerning recent developments that are closely related to the activities of the ILO. The international community has been freed from the constraints of East-West confrontation, a situation that was based on ideology and force. Our post-Cold War world is, however, faced with problems arising from the changing power relationship between the nations that dominated the old international order and from the destabilization of regions by ethnic, religious and other strife. There continues to be an urgent need for efforts to overcome poverty in developing nations, to ensure the success of structural adjustment and to combat destruction of the global environment, which affects all humanity and is becoming increasingly serious.

These challenges underscore the need to seek solutions to problems in a spirit of conciliation and cooperation in order to achieve peace and prosperity for all humankind. It goes without saying that the United Nations, the ILO and other international agencies are called upon to play an increasingly important role.

Consistently committed to its ideals as a peace-loving State and attaching central importance to the United Nations, Japan is determined to make every effort to contribute to the attainment of peace and prosperity throughout the world.

As is mentioned in the Report of the Director-General, social security systems in industrialized countries have been steadily improving in the course of the twentieth century and this has contributed greatly to solving the problems arising from poverty, unemployment, old-age, sickness and so on. On the other hand, social security systems in most developing countries are at a rudimentary stage and still far from adequate. I firmly believe that the very foundation for social development and a peaceful world is the creation of an environment that enables workers and their families to live free from anxiety. Therein, in my opinion, lies the significance of social security. There is a need not only for efforts by the countries concerned but also for assistance from the ILO, other international agencies and the industrialized countries to build and improve social security systems in developing countries appropriate to each nation's circumstances and to establish adequate social protection systems in those countries. I consider that it is essential for the ILO to fully mobilize its knowledge and experience, while governments, employers and workers should pool their wisdom in a spirit of dialogue and collaboration. Japan is determined to make active contributions in this field, working closely with the ILO and the parties constituting its membership.

I should now like to touch upon Japan's national experience. After the Second World War, Japan made a new start as a democratic nation under its new Constitution. The social security system in Japan developed greatly in the ensuing decades based on the constitutional provision that, and I quote, "all people shall have the right to maintain the minimum standards of wholesome and cultured living", culminating in the present system which covers the entire population.

The average life span in Japan has come to be the longest in the world, and Japan will soon have a society ageing at a pace faster than any other country has every experienced. A major task for us is to adapt the social security system to social changes – a declining birth rate, the entry of women into the labour market, the ageing of society and other changes. Japan intends to do its utmost to make the twenty-first century a bright one, full of hope for workers, exchanging knowledge and experience with other countries which face these and similar tasks. Japan intends to cooperate actively in this field with other nations and international organizations.

I should next like to refer to the need for ILO technical cooperation. Next year we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The rapid changes in the international situation in recent years seem to be of a magnitude comparable to the changes of those days. I consider that there is a great need for the ILO to provide technical cooperation as effectively and efficiently as possible, responding adequately to the diverse circumstances and needs of member States and regions. In particular, the developing countries, and countries in the process of structural adjustment, face the tasks of combating poverty, expanding employment opportunities and developing human resources. I believe that the ILO should strengthen its activities in these fields, working to make them increasingly effective. Coordination with the activities of the United Nations, currently undergoing reform, should be stressed to avoid duplication of effort.

Recognizing the role of the ILO will become more and more important in the years to come, Japan intends to contribute actively to ILO efforts to solve the problems in those countries.

I should now like to touch upon the standard-setting activities of the ILO.

The ILO, through its standard-setting activities, has succeeded in attaining remarkable achievements in the areas of protection of human rights and improving conditions of work, achievements to which I pay high tribute. Japan has consistently attached all due importance to international labour standards. The Government has just put before the Diet a proposal for ratifying of the ILO's Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120). It gives me great pleasure to be able to say that we have just been informed today of the approval by the Japanese Diet of this proposal.

In conclusion I should like to express the hope that this session will see fruitful discussions based on the Director-General's Report. I also wish to reaffirm very clearly my country's commitment to making renewed efforts to contribute to the ILO's fulfilment of its important tasks. Finally, let me express the confident hope that the International Labour Organization will achieve sound development in the years to come.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you.

I am very happy to congratulate the President on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia on his election to chair this session of the Conference. His election is a tribute to the Arab Republic of Egypt, its Government and its people, from whom the Conference has chosen its President. Thanks to his able leadership and long experience there is no doubt that all our expectations and aspirations will be fulfilled by the end of the Conference. May God grant him His help and ensure his success.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his re-election for a new term and I wish him every success in his work.

I should also like to welcome the new States as they join the International Labour Organization, which has been enriched by the new contributions they have made.

First and foremost I should like to thank the Director-General for having selected social insurance and social protection as the central topic of this session of the Conference. This subject is of great importance because of the fundamental role it plays in improving the social welfare of workers and its impact on the growth of productivity and the promotion of social and economic progress. In his comprehensive Report the Director-General has covered the various aspects relating to this topic and the strategy that he presented in the last chapter is worthy of study and consideration.

I would like to take this opportunity to give you a very brief description of the attention paid by the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia to the social welfare of workers and their families. Our country has adopted a system of social protection based on Islamic principles dating back more than 14 centuries. This scheme extends the broadest protection and most extensive coverage to workers and their families by providing substantial old-age pensions, disability insurance, and coverage for occupational accidents and illnesses. This insurance scheme is managed by a public institution with a legal personality and which is financially and administratively independent. It is not subject to taxation, and the State covers any deficits it might incur. It is managed by a governing body consisting of 11 members, out of which five represent the Government, three the workers and three the employers.

The system of social insurance in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is an innovative scheme based on Islamic law and the most modern international principles. Indeed, thanks to cooperation with the International Labour Organization, it provides coverage at the best levels recommended by international labour Conventions and Recommendations. It currently covers two branches or categories. Pensions are financed through workers' contributions of 5 per cent of wages and through employers' contributions of 8 per cent of wages. As regards insurance for occupational accidents and illnesses, this is financed by employers' contributions of 2 per cent of wages.

The pension fund provides a monthly pension for retired workers over 60. These workers can receive their pensions before reaching that age if they suffer from a disability unrelated to their occupations and have contributed to the pension fund for a sufficient period.

As regards the occupational accident insurance, which is financed exclusively by the employer, this insurance covers all medical care. It aims to maintain workers' health in the event of occupational accidents. If temporary disability ensures, the worker is entitled to a daily benefit of 75 per cent of his or her salary in addition to a family allowance of up to 20 per cent of the compensation. In addition, a premium of up to 50 per cent of the compensation is paid out if the victim requires the help of an attendant to carry on his or her normal life. If the worker is subject to a disability of over 30 per cent, he or she also receives one-off compensation.

As regards medical care for cases other than occupational accidents, i.e. medical insurance for workers, the State's medical services provide medical care free of charge to the entire population not otherwise covered by company insurance plans. (Large private enterprises have their own insurance policies.)

As far as unemployment insurance is concerned, thanks to the goodness of God and thanks to the development plans we have adopted, we do not have this problem. Saudi Arabia is recruiting workers from Arab and Muslim countries and from friendly countries, and they work side by side with their Saudi Arabian counterparts in a climate of social peace and full equality, in accordance with the Labour Code, which is based on Islamic law. Moreover, our legislation permits foreign workers to transfer their assets abroad without any restrictions or limitations, and without tax.

In addition to the social insurance scheme for workers in private enterprises, the Kingdom has for 48 years had a civilian pension scheme for civil servants and a military retirement plan for members of the military. And for 30 years now the Kingdom has had a social security scheme for regular assistance paid out of the state budget for vulnerable groups, such as orphans, destitute women, the handicapped, needy families, and families of prisoners, etc. These social security funds have been increased several times, and the last increase was in the order of 43 to 136 per cent. I will not mention other allowances for food or electricity or the coverage of several other services, which are not limited to citizens, but are given to foreign residents as well, and which demonstrate the Government's concern for the well-being of citizens and residents.

The question of the prevention of major industrial accidents is on this Conference's agenda for its second discussion. We trust that it will lead to positive results capable of improving working conditions in an environment of health and safety. Another question that is on the agenda is part-time work. Whatever the final orientation of the Convention or Recommendation may be, it is important that part-time work should contribute effectively to solving problems of the labour market rather than lead to new problems for full-time work.

We consider that the standard-setting activities generally should also take into consideration the differences between the various ecological, economic and social systems prevailing in different countries. I believe what is applicable in one country is not necessarily applicable in another.

While considering the various questions of interest to our peoples, we cannot ignore the atrocities occurring in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which has been subjected to all-out war and "ethnic cleansing" conducted by Serbs for over a year. This has left tens of thousands of martyrs killed and many other tens of thousands of people forced into exile, not to mention the victims of crimes and rapes perpetrated before the entire world against this unarmed Muslim people who are not permitted to receive weapons to defend themselves. We cannot turn a deaf ear to this tragedy and we call on the international community to assume its responsibility and try to bring the genocide and suffering to an end in Bosnia and Herzegovina, a member State of the United Nations.

May God help our Conference to fulfil its objectives, which we all share. May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Mr. MEDAISKIS (Minister of Social Security, Lithuania) – On behalf of the Lithuanian delegation, I wish to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the post of the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I wish also to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election to a second term as Director-General. The Lithuanian delegation appreciates this election and we wish Mr. Hansenne and Mr. Abdel-Hak every success in achieving the goals of the ILO.

Let me also express my warmest greetings to the delegations of the countries which have recently become Members of the ILO.

A date of great importance to all free nations is drawing near. In 1994, the International Labour Organization will be celebrating its own 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Philadelphia Declaration. I am sure we may all confirm that the International Labour Organization, in spite of various historical circumstances, remains faithful to its main ideal – that of safeguarding social peace all over the world. The extensive collective experience of the Organization is of great value to all countries striving to create conditions in which their citizens can enjoy fundamental human rights. This session's agenda is the best illustration of that fact.

Many of the problems faced by the Lithuanian social security system are common to central and eastern Europe, and have been analysed in the Director-General's excellent Report.

Lithuania started to create a social security system after the First World War, when the country regained its independence. At that time, Lithuania had introduced separate insurance schemes for civil servants, military personnel and employed workers. The occupational injuries scheme was developed some time later. In addition to these schemes, pensions were also provided by private enterprises for their workers.

The Soviet occupation interrupted the development of the Lithuanian social security system. The Soviet period was marked by the total state domination of every aspect of life including social security. When Lithuania embarked on the transition to a market economy, the social security system had to be reformed.

The main objectives of that reform are: to ensure decent living conditions for all, to enable workers to earn a decent wage, to ensure adequate protection for the old and disabled, to provide support for families with children, to eliminate poverty, and to raise living standards and ensure social justice.

The Government's aim is to achieve these objectives in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations. At present, these organizations are divided and sometimes unable to find common ground, though it should to be noted that Lithuanian trade unions have to some degree consolidated their position over the past year and have begun to engage in dialogue with the Government.

The first steps in the reform of the social security system in Lithuania were taken in 1988, although the principle legislation came into force only after the enactment of the law restoring independence to the Republic of Lithuania in March 1990.

The social insurance and social assistance schemes were placed on a statutory footing, and the social insurance budget was separated from state and local budgets. The new legislation determined the cover provided for compulsorily insured persons, and defined sickness, maternity and certain other benefits, as well as details of the revenues and expenditure of the social insurance budget and the rules governing state social insurance administration. The main social security institutions were created within a short period, these being the National Social Insurance Institution and the Labour Exchange Administration, which is also responsible for paying unemployment benefits.

The social insurance and employment schemes are now much better developed in Lithuania than the social assistance scheme, from both the legal and administrative points of view. During recent years, Lithuania has introduced a family support system. This system is based on the minimum subsistence level which is regularly adjusted in line with the prices' index. The major element under this system is means-tested. Local governments are responsible for operating the family support system, but are sometimes unable to cope with all the problems and prevent abuse. Improving the social safety net and finding a way to help everyone in need are among the most important short-term tasks.

In formulating the new Lithuanian legislation on labour and social security, we have carefully studied and taken into consideration the ILO Conventions and Recommendations. The Government recently submitted a proposal to Parliament to ratify a number of Conventions which have not yet been ratified by Lithuania. I hope this will be done in the near future.

In creating the social insurance system in Lithuania, it has been necessary to take major decisions and solve many problems in a very short time. Highly developed European countries have had a whole century to do what we have to do in a few years. On the other hand, we have some advantages: we may draw upon their experience and we are able to do many things because we have had to start from scratch. But we also suffer from serious disadvantages: we are experiencing a grave economic crisis, rising unemployment and poverty and greatly reduced living standards. Over the past year, prices have increased about 13-fold, while wages increased by a factor of only four, and pensions by a factor of six. We lack the time and the expertise required for large scale reform. Our society has grown accustomed to state benefits and is ill-prepared to share responsibility for social protection. Major problems arise from the fact that we are only just embarking on the transition from a state-regulated to a market economy, and the social insurance system, once fully adjusted to market conditions, will to some extent conflict with prevailing conditions and laws.

The support of national and international organizations is essential to our country in overcoming its difficulties. We are very grateful to all the governments and non-governmental organizations who have helped us. I am glad to take this opportunity to express my particular thanks to the International Labour Organization. We regard the activities of the Regional Office for Eastern and Central Europe in a most positive light, and believe it would be most desirable to develop activities of this kind in every possible way. I am convinced that all countries of this particular region have a keen interest in those activities because they all face similar social problems entailed by the transition to a market economy.

We are counting very much on the development of cooperation between Lithuania and the International Labour Organization in all spheres of activity. However, the situation is complicated by the prevailing financial difficulties. I would therefore like once again to point out, as we have already made clear to the United Nations Organization, that the Republic of Lithuania no longer bears any of the financial obligations incurred by the former Soviet Union, and it seems only fair to review our contributions to the ILO budget in view of the very difficult situation in Lithuania.

I am confident that such temporary difficulties will not prevent increased collaboration between Lithuania and the International Labour Organization, and that this collaboration will be successfully continued and developed.

(Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May the peace, the mercy and the blessings of God be with you. On behalf of the business world of Saudi Arabia, may I extend my warmest congratulations to the President on the confidence placed in him by the Conference. This display of confidence is not surprising in view of his great ability and wide-ranging experience, coming as he does from a country well known for its traditions and its long history.

The International Labour Conference, at its present session, is reviewing the Director-General's Report on subjects of great sensitivity and importance and of concern to all the participants in the Conference. The prevention of major industrial accidents has been presented in detail in the light of the extensive experience of such accidents acquired in the advanced industrialized countries. We have also been made aware of the importance of social insurance and social protection and the ILO's role in enhancing the efficiency of social protection schemes. We have thus identified certain key strategic areas in which action must be taken if social protection is to be extended to larger sectors of the world population and applied in such a way as to approach the ideals set forth in international labour declarations and standards, in particular in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102). Statutory social security schemes exist in principle in practically every country in the world but the level of protection, the scope of existing schemes and the extent and effectiveness of coverage differ widely from country to country.

I should like to give you an idea of Saudi experience in implementing its social insurance scheme that is regarded as ideal in comparison with others. It is based essentially on protection of workers' social rights, which are viewed as one of the key components of Saudi development plans. It was introduced in 1983 and is a modern scheme similar to those currently applied in most advanced countries and some developing countries. Its main aim is to offer workers additional protection covering medical care in the event of industrial accidents and providing for daily benefit, a monthly income and lump-sum compensation. On the whole, the system offers workers greater security, encouraging them to increase their productivity in return for a contribution amounting to no more than 2 per cent of wages paid by the employer, who also helps to defray staff medical expenses, thus alleviating the burden on workers.

Saudi Arabia has from the outset made every effort to prepare its national economy for gradual and yet intensive development designed eventually to raise the standard of living of its citizens so that they are better equipped to cope with the realities of modern life. We were well aware from the start that economic development is not an end in itself but rather a means of providing appropriate material conditions, offering people a decent life and creating a social environment conducive to individual self-fulfilment and a stable society, while safeguarding cultural identity and the Islamic character of Saudi society. The scale of the development achieved in this area may be measured by the sharp contrast between the living conditions of Saudi citizens today and those same conditions 20 years ago.

The system of social insurance in Saudi Arabia is characterized by mutual agreement between the public and private sectors on the need for continuous action to improve the living standards of workers, since they are one of the cornerstones of development.

Basing itself on this principle, Saudi Arabia took care when developing the system to respect the most recent principles of social security, drawing on the services of experts and ensuring that the system complied with the most recent ILO recommendations and world trends while respecting Saudi traditions and ethics.

The public social insurance institution, with its financial resources and investments, is considered to be one of the main bodies operating in the public and private sectors to improve the performance of the social services and to enhance social solidarity in Saudi Arabia. Social insurance in Saudi Arabia covers two fields in particular: pensions and occupational hazards.

The Report of the Director-General mentions technical cooperation, a subject of the greatest importance for many developing countries that import technology. They include the Arab States, which appreciate the ILO's efforts and hope that it will attach greater importance to the development of technical cooperation projects designed to meet the urgent needs of the Arab countries.

I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the ILO's role in publishing and disseminating technological information. We hope that some of these documents will be published in Arabic and that Arab experts can play a more prominent role in technical programmes and technical cooperation.

On the occasion of the election of a new Governing Body of the ILO, I should like to extend warm thanks to the members of the previous Governing Body for the work they accomplished and for their dedication to the basic principles of the ILO. I wish the new Governing Body every success. We trust that it will continue to pursue the aims and aspirations of all the constituents of the ILO and we shall do all we can to facilitate its task.

In conclusion, I should like to wish the Conference every success. We hope that it will add new achievements to the list of those already to the credit of the ILO in its work of standardizing machinery and structures with a view to guaranteeing and protecting the social rights of workers, who are both a means of development and its end.

May God's peace and mercy be with you.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Lebanon) – I should like to apologize on behalf of the Minister of Labour, Mr. Al Amin, who was unable to attend this Conference for reasons beyond his control. I would like to deliver this statement both on his and my own behalf.

I would like to express my sincere congratulations to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his unanimous election. The individual who has been elected is of the highest calibre. We know him well, and we know his patriotism and his human qualities and his ability to combine them, which all make him a spokesman for part of the world and enable him to reflect the thinking of the whole of humanity.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents. Their wisdom and integrity have won them the confidence of their groups and the Conference as a whole. As regards the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, his re-election to a second term of office testifies to the appreciation we feel for his wide experience, immense knowledge and sound management, and for his work to expand his programmes and plans, which have made the International Labour Office a unique institution, and one able to keep pace with the demands of contemporary civilization.

I would like to assure you that it is impossible for me to cover in ten minutes all the efforts that have been undertaken in the course of one year. This Report is the result of long reflection and carefully considered action. Nevertheless, I would like to pass on to him the congratulations of my country, Lebanon, which is emerging from war and chaos and finding its way towards peace, and hope. In the course of the previous sessions, we have come to talk about our bleak present; now at this 80th Session, we can talk about our hope for the future. I believe we have initiated two major projects in the Middle East. One is the reconstruction of Beirut, which will become a major centre of the twenty-first century. The other is the education of the Lebanese to enable them to keep pace with the demands of the age. The urban rebirth will go hand in hand with a human rebirth.

Our urgent request for assistance from the ILO has clearly been a source of satisfaction, given the prompt reply we have had. I would like here to mention the experts sent out as part of a mission by the Assistant Director-General Mr. Dajani. One mission after another has come to us. Their task was not an impossible one, but still difficult, but they were determined, they tried and they succeeded. I am confident that the Minister of Labour as well as the other sectors of administration which deal with labour-related matters will quickly implement the recommendations and technical cooperation agreements which were adopted with all the necessary dispatch and astuteness.

As an example, I should mention that two weeks ago the decision was taken to establish a commission consisting of the most eminent jurists and sociologists who will be responsible for reviewing labour legislation and social security. In cooperation with trade union leaders, we are trying to establish a balanced dialogue and create a trade union structure in keeping with contemporary requirements – a structure not based on sectarian or religious affiliations, and one which will not mix professional and craft elements, but will instead be based on the different sectors of activity and whose legitimacy will be the basis of its liberty. I am proud to say that trade union freedom based on responsibility is developing in Lebanon. The State cannot claim any great credit for this since Lebanon can only develop in conditions of freedom and with the participation of all the elements for whom democratic dialogue is the only chance to live in freedom.

I would like to thank all the member States of the ILO and the Governing Body on the occasion of the resumption of work by the ILO Regional Office in Beirut. We extend our cordial greetings to the Office and will make all necessary facilities available to it, since it represents for us and international symbol and a source of national pride.

In the second part of the Report by the Director-General, we read about the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied territories. Israel in fact is fully aware that the violations which it perpetrates go far beyond the annual Report. The technologies of today enable us to show in sound and images how Arab workers, and in particular Palestinians, are being treated; how they are imprisoned and exiled, how they or their children are killed, their shops and houses are being destroyed. These stories are not confined to newspapers. We can see the images on television, and so it is useless to deny or invent spurious justifications for this situation. Israel and those who support Israel know that the Arabs need more than any other people peace, and they know that Israel can obtain squadrons of aircraft free of charge, while Arab countries must sacrifice a university, a school or a hospital to pay for one aircraft. We need peace, but we will not capitulate. Israel must accept human reason, abide by the law and learn the difference between honesty and treachery. If it does not do so, it will continue to live in fear.

We, for our part, can say to the world that resisting occupation is our right and one does not negotiate with an intransigent foe.

In the Director-General's statement, reference is made to the celebration of the 75th jubilee of the ILO. On such occasions, it is the custom to exchange gifts. What will our gift be? I feel very proud when I think back of the various Directors-General of the ILO, the members of the Governing Body, the experts, specialists or ordinary workers. Some of them are no longer with us, others are still alive. My gift to all of them is sincere friendship, my hopes and my wishes. But the greatest gift to them is to recall the slogan established by the first Director-General of this Organization, Mr. Albert Thomas. It was: "If you wish for peace, cultivate justice". Next year, many delegations will come to this Organization bearing symbolic gifts. The greatest level of humanity and civilization will be shown by the delegation which comes to Geneva saying: "Albert Thomas, we have cultivated justice in our country, and now we enjoy peace".

Mr. SHARIF (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Pakistan) – Allow me, on behalf of the employers of Pakistan, to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election to preside over this session of the Conference. We would like to express our confidence in their leadership and assure them of our fullest cooperation as they guide the proceedings of this session of the Conference.

While congratulating the Director-General on his re-election for a second term, I compliment him on his Reports to the Conference. In Part I the Director-General has covered in great depth the central theme for this year's session of the Conference, Social insurance and social protection in the member States. He has enumerated the problems facing health care programmes and has highlighted the future development of social protection systems which will be able to cope with any difficult situations which may arise, and indeed have arisen in recent years. Part II gives an account of the activities of the ILO in 1992, and information concerning the draft programme and budget for the 1994-95 biennium is provided in Report II.

As very rightly highlighted in the Report, social security is considered as one of the acquired rights of workers in industrialized countries, while on the other hand the vast populations of developing countries are very far from being adequately protected. In the latter countries pensions and unemployment benefits are rather limited in the social security schemes under operation.

One of the reasons can be explained by a report published recently by the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), which says that the traditional cures, namely pushing overall economic growth and relying on welfare, both failed to take nearly 1 billion rural people in 114 developing countries to the promised land of minimum adequate nutrition, health, shelter and education. The report goes on the say that today's billion could rise to as much as 1.5 billion by the year 2000.

The Director-General in Chapter 2 of his Report has touched upon the critical issue confronted by us in the area of social protection and has rightly raised the question of whether objectives which are appropriate to developed economies need to be adapted to developing countries. This question becomes all the more pertinent when we observe that in most of the developing countries in Asia and Africa, where social security programmes do exist in some form or other, less than 10 per cent of the economically active population is employed in the formal sector and barely 2 per cent of the population employed in the formal sector is covered by social security programmes.

The reason for this dilemma has been clearly pointed out in the Report. The developing countries do not possess the basic framework to establish a self-balancing network of contributors and beneficiaries. Furthermore, there is no revenue from general taxation which could be sufficient to provide benefits on a universal basis. I agree with the Director-General that the solution to this dilemma lies in the large-scale extension of the formal sector as a fundamental prerequisite for the further development of social programmes.

Against this background, the Director-General has rightly pointed out that social protection in the developing countries will need to form an integral part of general economic and social development and will have to be part and parcel of the broader issues of economic, political and social development.

The second part of the Director-General's Report touches upon the ILO activities in the area of international labour standards, human rights, employment strategies, entrepreneurship, management development, training, industrial relations, labour administration, working conditions and environment, as well as sectoral activities. I must pay tribute to the Director-General and the ILO for pursuing an active partnership policy. I am sure, if properly implemented, this policy will play a vital role in the ILO's efforts to support developing countries, particularly in meeting their challenges of social and human resources development.

The visit of the Director-General of the ILO to Pakistan this year, his meetings with the high-level officials in Pakistan, as well as employers and workers in various cities of Pakistan, have been a source of encouragement to us in the Employers' Federation of Pakistan. With ILO assistance our Federation has established an Occupational Safety and Health Unit within the Federation which will provide assistance and suggest ways and means to member organizations to improve productivity and the work environment by preventing losses on account of industrial accidents and promote greater safety and health care awareness.

We welcome the ILO activities which will now focus on regional technical programmes. Employers in Pakistan have benefited from ILO assistance in the provision of technical expertise for various programmes in training; labour administration, social security, rehabilitation of returning migrant workers, employment promotion, etc. We wish to acknowledge the cooperation and assistance of the Bureau for Employers' Activities. It is my fervent hope that ACT/EMP will continue this technical assistance more vigorously with the new organizational changes. I am referring to the multidisciplinary teams towards which we look to with considerable interest. We hope that the multidisciplinary teams will play a significant role in the technical assistance programme of the ILO.

Like every other country in the region, Pakistan has, during the past few years, made major strides towards economic emancipation. Our continuing war against poverty and our strong political will to win the race of social and economic development is bound to bear fruit. Our economic policies and efforts towards structural adjustment in the wake of global economic transition, particularly with the emergence of new zones of socio-economic and political importance in Central Asia offer us a new vision and a new opportunity of utilizing our most valuable human resources for the pursuit of our development needs. This new vision and these new opportunities are as much of an asset to us as they are to the developed and developing countries of my region. I call upon my colleagues here to reflect on these opportunities which could help us achieve our common goal of economic independence and social improvement.

Original Spanish: Mr. BRUNELLI (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – The representatives of the Argentine workers wish to congratulate the President on his appointment and the Director-General for his re-election and for having chosen Social insurance and social protection as the topic of his Report.

Although States cannot directly ensure that all citizens have jobs, they must nevertheless ensure that human rights are not trampled by the economy.

The central conclusion of the United Nations 1993 Human Development Report is that unregulated markets and excessive free trade aggravate inequality and poverty and create unemployment.

We maintain that capital should serve the economy, and that the economy should serve man, for otherwise man is degraded and becomes a mere input in the productive process.

In this sense, man prevails over the market, and the economy is legitimized by its social function. The economy should be strengthened through a humanized capitalism, compatible with the ethical, philosophical and political postulates of social justice, without which the economy loses all justification and meaning and degenerates into the exploitation of man by man.

The objectives of the Encyclical Centesimus Annus include a participatory democracy dominated by virtue and a rehumanized economy with man at its centre in order to achieve a more prosperous, fairer, freer and therefore more human society.

The Encyclical adds a warning that this lofty social objective will require a struggle against economic systems which give absolute priority to capital, and against the inhuman features of the market.

The State, as guarantor of justice, social well-being, the rights of the workers, the social function of enterprises and the national economy, cannot disregard these matters.

Lack of employment and lower wages naturally lead to greater poverty and social exclusion.

The stability achieved by my people has been positive, but stability alone is not sufficient. The workers are the majority anonymous investors, and we are having to bear the brunt of the cost of adjustment. There is an urgent need for growth policies that favour job creation and a real and fair distribution of national income.

However, some employers, pointing to the prevailing imbalance and the high cost of labour, are pursuing their own advantages to the detriment of society.

The distribution of costs and benefits must recover its social equity. Even though some macroeconomic indicators are positive, their effects have not yet filtered down to the micro level, where the basic needs of millions of people are still unmet.

The minimum wage guaranteed by our Constitution in accordance with Conventions Nos. 26 and 131 and Recommendations Nos. 30 and 135 of the ILO must be updated, since it barely covers 10 per cent of basic needs.

It is imperative to re-establish balance between capital and labour through due monitoring of the labour order and through free collective bargaining, which must be respected by the State, as affirmed by the President of this Conference.

In drawing up an economic policy that does not spare social cost, we must rethink our methodology in order to curb the dismissal of workers and provide a new framework for the participation of trade union organizations.

I must mention serious events which have taken place such as the civil war in the former Yugoslavia, the persecution of the Turks in Germany and the threats to democracy in Latin America. We express our solidarity with those who are suffering. As a philosopher once said, "I am human; hence, nothing human is foreign to me".

The labour policy of our country is characterized by one major objective – to lower labour costs. To achieve this objective, basic principles of labour law and even undermining the Constitution have been infringed, undermining legal security, which extends beyond labour relations, thereby affecting the whole of society.

Aside from collective bargaining in the public sector, it is difficult to think of any labour standard which has not been infringed. Self-regulatory mechanisms have been dismantled and collective bargaining reached its peak when unconstitutional decrees and awards of the labour administration suspended almost 70 collective agreements. We filed complaints with the ILO, whose findings upheld our arguments.

We understand that markets should drive trade, industry and production, but the care and health of human beings cannot be left to market forces. The joint bodies which were created by workers and employers to preserve health and improve the quality of life for millions of Argentines should regain their full force and independence, and the legislation which dissolved them should be repealed as unconstitutional.

The decrees which call for the decentralization of collective bargaining and scale back the wages of workers, as well as the proposed reform of our labour legislation, are rejected by the CGT because they violate the constitutional rights and interests of workers.

The labour administration has gone beyond its competence in declaring strikes illegal, thereby authorizing the firing of striking workers, as in the cases of Aerolíneas Argentinas, road transport and the Argentine railways, among others.

The labour reform proposed by the Minister of Labour is unacceptable because it is based on a failed model which overlooks the legal, social and cultural goals of the Argentine workers. Also unacceptable are reforms which view workers as mere inputs in the productive process.

The content of the new formulas tends to undermined labour. For example, it is argued that an individual worker can bargain with his employer and give up certain inalienable rights. In order to decrease labour costs, efforts are made to lengthen the working day to ten hours. The freedom to dismiss workers at will, subject only to the payment of an indemnity, is being expanded as the reform proposes to reduce the amount of the indemnity. The powers of the employer have increased to the detriment of the dignity of the worker.

There are also efforts to repeal laws that establish special statutes; this would leave certain workers unprotected. We hope that the President's exemption of journalists will extend to other professions.

Lastly, attempts are being made against trade union participation, collective autonomy and freedom of association. We should note that these reforms were rejected by most Argentinians as soon as they were published.

In the field of social security, the Ministry of Labour in a piece of proposed legislation disavowed its constitutional obligations to guarantee social security. The CGT therefore argued its case and obtained several amendments, namely, solidarity as an integral part of the system, and the State's recognition of its obligations, which it may not delegate.

Marginality is a growing social phenomenon, and priority must be given to it through suitable socioeconomic policies, particularly as regards hidden unemployment, or those who are too discouraged to look for work. They are outside the labour market; if not looked after, marginality will increase along with abandoned children, delinquency and social insecurity.

In a world which is changing we require new strategies and new forms of development. But the objectives of the workers' movement remain unchanged – a better life, with a fairer distribution of the product of capital and labour.

The proposals drawn up by the General Confederation of Labour in order for our labour legislation to evolve in accordance with changes in the world must centre on man and social justice.

Given these objectives, the instrument we have chosen to guarantee the respect of constitutional rights, pursue the democratization of labour relations and the fuller participation of workers and their trade union organizations through machinery for consultation.

The Director-General of the ILO has asked whether we must, in an era when market forces and competition predominate, abandon the objectives of social protection which are the very basis of standed setting? There is only one answer: the Argentine workers' movement will never abandon the principles of social justice.

In the tradition of General Juan Domingo Perón, who defended this ideal in our country, we embrace you warmly.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. At the outset permit me to state that I am happy to transmit to this august body the greetings of his Royal Highness, the President of the United Arab Emirates, and to extend to you his best wishes for the success of this Conference.

On behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates and on my own behalf I would also like to offer my congratulations to the Egyptian Minister of Manpower and Training, Mr Abdel-Hak, on his election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. We who know him know how much he is worthy of this post. His great wisdom and long experience will, we are certain, permit him to lead our Conference's work to a successful conclusion, and we will thus achieve the success that we are hoping for.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents representing the different tripartite groups on the confidence that the Conference has placed in them. We wish them every success in their efforts to assist the President.

I would like on behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates to extend a welcome to the States which have recently joined the International Labour Organization. Their membership in this Organization will strengthen its universal character and the links of international co-operation in the labour field.

May I also be allowed to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his re-election at the session of the Governing Body in May. Mr. Hansenne fully deserves the trust that has been placed in him, and his re-election is an appropriate reward for the numerous accomplishments of his present term of office and for his efforts on behalf of our Organization. We wish him full success as the head of our Organization's executive body.

The agenda of this session of the International Labour Conference contains many vital and important questions. In addition to the Director-General's Report and that of the Governing Body, several technical questions are on the agenda. We are certain that, thanks to the works of the plenary sittings and the standing and technical committees, the Conference will be able to achieve satisfactory results concerning all these questions.

The Director-General made an excellent choice of topic for Part I of his Report. Social security is today one of the foremost issues in social protection. This is a very complex matter because it covers a number of different issues, such as the administrative and actuarial systems and the various fields of prevention.

This Report should therefore be carefully and thoroughly studied. The International Labour Office must extend its technical assistance and share its experience with its member States.

In the United Arab Emirates, we have established a social security system which affords protection to all social categories that need it, and this within a framework of a very flexible and easily managed administrative system in harmony with our society's characteristics.

We are now trying to set up new social insurance schemes for workers in the private sector in order to provide them with old-age and disability benefits, insurance for industrial accidents, and occupational injuries, and health insurance and pensions, so that the workers in this sector may be treated equally to civil servants and staff in the public sector.

The technical cooperation activities of the International Labour Organization are of growing importance for the developing countries owing to the various characteristics of these countries – their lack of resources and infrastructure, their unbalanced level of development and their inability of be self-sufficient. We would therefore strongly urge the ILO to upgrade its technical cooperation programmes in all their forms and in all fields, particularly for the poorest countries which need them most.

The United Arab Emirates has established a clear policy as regards cooperation and external assistance. We have created specialized institutions and bodies which are in charge of funding, planning and carrying out such assistance and following it up. We have also established close cooperation with international organizations and bodies which have competence in this area and we are continuing our efforts in this field to the extent that we can.

Part II of the Report of the Director-General gives a detailed description of the activities of the Organization in 1992. We highly commend this work.

We would also like to congratulate the Governing Body for the important achievements of the last session and for the success it has had in its programmes. The establishment of multidisciplinary teams is a positive and innovative step. These teams will in fact be closer to the problems in the different countries and will therefore be in a better position to solve these problems by offering the ILO's services more effectively. The Governing Body also introduced some improvements in the operation of the Conference and of the Governing Body itself, and it called upon the ILO – in the light of its competence in the social field – to play a major role in the preparation, holding and the follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development which is to be held in 1995.

The Governing Body has also decided to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO and, for our part, we consider that this celebration should not be held in a traditional way, but rather should be an opportunity to review what has been achieved and to look to the future. On this occasion we should see what challenges face us and how to go about meeting them, while looking to the twenty-first century and trying to achieve world peace through social justice.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the Government group at this session which paid me the honour of naming me Chairman. This is also a tribute to my country, the United Arab Emirates.

I wish you success in your work. May God's peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-DAJANI (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the employers of Jordan, represented by the Chamber of Industry of Amman, and on my own behalf, I have the honour of congratulating the President on his election to the chair of the 89th Session of the International Labour Conference, a mark of the esteem in which he is held internationally, given his special position in the Arab world, his wide experience in labour matters and in vocational training, and the reputation he enjoys in the Arab Republic of Egypt, which has made considerable progress in economic, social and scientific development. The Arab Labour Organization also works alongside its Arab member countries in developing social concepts of work and in applying them in such a way as to achieve social stability and hence peace, security and regional and international cooperation.

We have full confidence in the ability of the President of this session of the Conference which will guarantee its success and lay the basis for the success of future sessions.

I should like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his sterling work on behalf of the Organization and on his unanimous election for a second term of office. We were extremely pleased when he visited us at the Chamber of Industry in Amman, where he was welcomed by the Chairman, the members and many employers. Important discussions took place on the Organization's work on behalf of the development of labour and of production capacities. We decided to set up a special unit equipped with ILO publications, documents and reports as reference material for those interested in labour problems and the Organization's efforts in that area. General consciousness-raising and instruction regarding employment are important starting points for the establishment of equitable systems and concepts applicable to the social component of economic development and for the interlinking of economic and social goals, so that economic development redounds to the benefit of all. This would lay the basis for social reform involving mother and child protection, aid and training facilities for the handicapped, and protection of all human beings against poverty and unemployment.

I should like to reaffirm our commitment to the principle of tripartite dialogue between the Ministry of Labour, trade unions and employers' associations. The upshot of such cooperation has been the establishment of an institute of social security and a vocational training institute. Recently, an agreement was concluded on a review of labour legislation to make it more clear and to ensure that it covers the rights and duties of workers and employers. This new legislation contains, inter alia, a provision requiring the employment of a certain percentage of handicapped persons in enterprises and provides for an increase in maternity leave from 42 to 70 days.

The Report of the Director-General Social insurance and social protection expresses profound humanitarian feeling. It deals with fundamental concepts that are in line with the fundamental beliefs of Islam, which inter alia provides for an alms tax (Zakat) which confirms the right of all, workers or others in need, to assistance without distinction on grounds of race, sex, or religion or identity. Human compassion is a duty. None the less, expanding this concept would, I believe, depend on economic capacity and the rate of economic growth as well as employment possibilities. As employers, in Jordan we are cooperating with official authorities in order to focus initiatives in the field of investment and at the same time to improve the level of vocational training and introduce new elements into education and training, to complement traditional forms. We are trying to encourage self-employment as a way of fighting unemployment. We also encourage small- and medium-sized enterprises, especially those which supply existing industries. The goals and objectives are clear, but achieving them is a question of time and our economic and financial resources. In point of fact, this depends on our capacity to shoulder the burden of taxes, which is particularly high in Jordan. They are perhaps the highest of all developing countries, but we are not against this because the Government needs this income to supplement government expenditure and in particular social protection.

The concept of social security is reaching all levels and we are proud to say that people in Jordan have voluntarily contributed to the creation of hospitals and to the establishment of a centre to treat cancer patients. We were able, in a few months, to collect 70 per cent of the amount needed, which initially amounted to 120 million dinars.

This is proof of what we mean by compassion.

Under the guidance of His Majesty, King Hussein, we are entering a new era of hope based on democracy and we are undergoing consultations in order to strengthen the International Bill of Human Rights, consolidate pluralism and respect for the opinions of others, because the basic element in all this is man and the true wealth of people. The individual that assumes his responsibilities is a man who constructs, produces and who gives the fruit of his labour for the sake of social protection. We believe that it is also indispensable to ensure and cover the needs of the needy, the elderly, the disabled and the sick. The twenty-first century must concentrate on people throughout the world, to preserve their dignity and guarantee fulfilment of their needs and safety.

We hope that this will be the slogan of this Organization when it celebrates its 75th anniversary.

Original Italian: Mr. VANNI (Workers' delegate, Italy) – In his Report on Social insurance and social protection, the Director-General quite rightly considers the concept of social security established in the advanced countries as one of the main factors of social progress in the twentieth century. We cannot but support his hope that this system might in time become the common achievement of all the citizens and workers of the world.

This objective does not mean that everything must be reduced by simplification to solidarity schemes. On the contrary, it is the political element which must be systematically emphasized. Economic development coupled with social progress is the only instrument we have to strengthen and promote democracy.

The ILO's commitment to furnish adequate support to social security policies considered in their universality as regards beneficiaries, benefits and geographical coverage, becomes of strategic value in such a context.

This strategy must be directed against the attempt, which is appearing in industrialized countries, to counter economic difficulties and market competition by making radical cuts in social benefits at the risk of impoverishing the weakest sectors of society.

But this does not in any way mean that we should disregard the financing problems which are affecting, in different ways, the industrialized and developing countries, and which are the result of the economic crisis, employment levels and a change in value of benefits over time. Supplementary schemes try to meet the need to mobilize new savings from workers to be used for social protection purposes.

However, the ILO, as a specialized agency of the United Nations responsible for the world of work, must express its clear opposition to the hypothesis, which is widespread today, that economic recovery can be achieved by the reduction of social achievements in the field of social protection and workers' incomes. It is only by keeping economic development and social progress on an equal footing that we will be able to establish a tripartite policy to overcome present economic and political difficulties and, above all, to achieve the objective of maximum productive employment.

The general acceptance of a market economy may result in the extension of development if it is based on scientific research, product quality and technical expertise: however, it will become a perverse instrument of the international division of labour if it is limited to simple competition based on direct or indirect labour costs.

The role of the ILO's standard-setting activities is, in such a context, of paramount importance. It may well be that some of these standards need to be updated and brought in line with production and bargaining systems which have changed, but it is quite absurd to establish a parallel between greater employment opportunities and the savage flexibilization of labour relations and social achievements.

The ILO's standard-setting activities provide us with the best instrument for defending social achievements in the advanced economy countries and, at the same time, promote the social and economy development of the developing countries.

To establish a correlation between respect for international standards and the provision of technical assistance should not be interpreted as putting a brake on development, but as a form of protection against the exploitation of the labour force, which too often has been practised by the multinationals themselves. The insertion of a social clause in international trade relations and agreements is a step forward in this same direction.

It is in the interests of all the workers to prevent any kind of social dumping. This is why we are fighting, within the European Community, against any attempts at self-sufficiency. And this is why we would like to see the European Economic Area extended to the countries in Eastern Europe and in the African, Asian and Balkan sides of the Mediterranean in a vision of co-development.

The globalization of the economy should not become a savage competition race between the various productive communities.

Next year we will be celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO's Constitution. We should do so under the banner of tripartism, codetermination and the participation of the workers in the construction of a more just society. The choice of a market economy must not become the victory of capital over work. The enterprise as a meeting place between capital and labour is a social asset which must be protected through the application of new labour relations and different forms of participation. It is only in this way that a correct structural adjustment of productive systems can be achieved. It is only in this way that the privatization now under way in almost all the countries of the world in the search for the maximum efficiency in productive systems should be conceived.

The economic and political crisis which the world has experienced in recent years, following the dismantling of the Berlin Wall, and which has shaken our hope for greater democracy and greater social justice, must be seen as an instrument for the renewal of the values which have characterized the world of work, the enterprise, manual workers and employees. Without an affirmation of these new values, it is the law of the jungle which will prevail, whether at the level of countries or social classes. Our action on behalf of social justice and the rights of peoples must serve to prevent such an eventuality.

International solidarity and multi-bilateral programmes are effective instruments if we can separate them from the old power politics. This is also a task which could be entrusted to the ILO and its regional programmes, multidisciplinary teams, social partnership policies, the Turin Centre, as well as its workers' education and management training programmes.

However, if the ILO lets itself be swayed, as many are asking it to do, by the siren song of market flexibility, in the sterile hope of producing employment, it will certainly lose its role within the United Nations system. Above all, it will lose its function of protecting the rights of man and of all those who work.

The hour of truth has come for the ILO.

Original French: Mr. GAYAMA (representative of the Organization of African Unity) – Just a few weeks ago the Organization of African Unity met from 16 to 25 April in Cairo, at the 16th session of the Labour Commission at the generous invitation of the Government of Egypt.

In the President, the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference has selected an outstanding specialist from the Egyptian Ministry of Manpower and Training, which he commands with the same level of skill employed on behalf of the African Labour Commission.

As we have both been on the same team and waged the same campaign to make labour a way of earning a living and a way of promoting social justice, progress and development, the President and myself inevitably come to Geneva bearing the same message.

This message which calls for peace, democracy, political stability and human rights and the rights of all which should be enjoyed in a climate of tolerance, mutual understanding and international cooperation, the heads of state and of the Government of the Organization of African Unity will once again be proclaimed in a few days' time in Cairo, on the occasion of the 30th anniversary of the Organization of African Unity.

Undoubtedly, the land of Egypt is a fitting location for the major events of history, and the rays of Africa's glorious past still light up our lives.

Today we sometimes speak about the marginalization of Africa, meaning degradation of the overall socio-economic situation in this country. This is precisely what we refuse to accept, especially the notion that marginalization is tantamount to a foregone conclusion.

We reject the idea that human resources are powerless, which would amount to an admission of defeat before any serious attempt has been made to develop or mobilize them.

The persistence of what the experts call structural unemployment and which also affects to various degrees the economies of industrialized countries surely expresses the ever-increasing gap between the structures of production, standards of remuneration and real needs. Are we not witnessing an irreparable breakdown between widespread progressive ideas on the one hand born of opportunist ideologies and the true vocation of man for work, on the other?

Day after day, the obsolescence of certain theories on development and economic growth mean they are becoming as ineffective as the much-debated performance of structural adjustment programmes whose main characteristics are to exclude the human factor from all so-called national analysis.

Africa calls for human resources fully to be utilized as they constitute an important factor in any viable alternative for the economic order. By introducing the necessary requirements of solidarity to back up the sacred parameters of productivity and the free market, many problems would be, if not resolved, at least rendered less unbearable than usual in a world which, paradoxically, is able to produce in massive quantities but finds it so hard to distribute and pay for what it produces.

Today's uncertainties coincide with so many blockages both at the national and international levels, and there we can see the reasons behind the frequent lack of urgency felt with regard to finding universal answers to universal problems.

This holds true for the fight against environmental pollution, the control of waves of migration for reasons of employment, as well as the fight against degrading phenomena such as the exploitation of human beings.

With regard to the first of these points, Africa has always made known its concern that international conventions be fully respected, including the Bamako Convention which prohibits the dumping of toxic waste on its territory, on the Ban of the Import into Africa and the Control of Transboundary Movement of All Forms of Hazardous Wastes within Africa, to guarantee the health and survival of future generations, of biological species and other natural resources.

Similarly, the OAU has always stood its ground with regard to respect for the human person, in particular as long as the system of apartheid precluded any chance of improving the working conditions of the black majority in South Africa. The frequent and deplorable accidents in South African coal mines confirm the reasons for our concern and speak volumes about what remains to be done at this level, and at the political level.

On the eve of the World Conference on Human Rights which will begin on 15 June 1993 in Vienna, we are faced with the need to put our legal instruments into shape and at the same time ensure their credibility through guaranteeing universal respect for them and not merely selective use.

At this level, the legislation and practice of certain industrialized countries with regard to migrant workers, particularly Africans, give rise to serious doubts over their compliance with the relevant provisions of United Nations conventions and covenants on human rights and on economic, social and cultural rights.

In some cases, measures supposedly aimed at controlling the flood of irregular immigration go as far as to prevent families from being reunited and sometimes even go as far as justifying xenophobia, the fresh upsurge of which represents one of the major dangers facing African nationals, particularly in European countries.

In Algiers last February the OAU and the League of Arab States held a seminar which enabled both organizations to look at all the aspects surrounding the problem of international migration, and advocated that negotiations be held between workers' home and host countries.

As can be seen, efforts should not be relaxed with regard to establishing the rule of law throughout the world and to ensuring the success of the reforms demanded by international cooperation, this further symbol of peace and stability.

In this regard, we welcome the example set by the International Labour Organization, one of the forums which fosters the healthy debates expected by the international community in its search for a more harmonious international order.

Such harmony can only be achieved by a combination of all the factors which contribute to raising the status of labour and human activity, which is not always the major concern in certain quarters, such as in GATT or in the main Bretton Woods institutions which have never given social questions the attention they deserve.

The tripartite system which, within the ILO, helps bring together governments, workers and employers on major issues has achieved measured success in meeting the challenges put before it.

The OAU is pleased to have maintained a convergence of views with the ILO and we are grateful to the men and women who work in this organization alongside Mr. Michel Hansenne, a man who fully deserves the recognition of the international community expressed through his re-election to the post of Director-General.

I would like to take this opportunity once again to congratulate Mr. Hansenne and pass on the warm regards of Mr. Salim Ahmed Salim, the Secretary-General of the OAU and remind him of our desire to continue cooperation with him and his team.

Finally, as I said at the beginning, Africa has many reasons to hope that this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference will produce the same positive results as the meeting held by the African Labour Commission in Cairo under your guidance.

What, in Cairo, did we discuss, apart from the issues I have just mentioned? Basically, the worsening situation in Africa as a result of many sources of political tension which in turn lead to a disturbing social situation for many categories, including workers and of course women and children who are living in difficult circumstances, not to mention displaced persons and disabled survivors of armed conflicts.

We have a particular task to carry out on their behalf and undoubtedly the decisions of this session will help us to do this.

Mr. MENDOZA (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – My country's Workers' delegation congratulates the President of the Conference as well as the Director-General for his new term as the head of this Organization.

About a year ago, we elected a new Government in the Philippines under President Fidel V. Ramos. This new Government under our Constitution will be in office for six years.

The Government of President Ramos was elected into office under the platform of "people empowerment". Simply put, "people empowerment" means giving the common man the capabilities – politically, economically, socially – to enable him to better determine his future and the future of his family.

The majority of the Philippine labour organizations remain optimistic that this new Government will succeed where its predecessors had failed. For, as we always remind President Ramos, the core of his "people empowerment" programme is essentially the empowerment of workers. Workers in the agricultural, industrial and informal sectors comprise the majority of the Philippine population. They are the least privileged in terms of economic and political status. Thus, they are the ones which need the most empowerment.

Initial attempts to actualize this programme of people empowerment had yielded positive results. Already, six trade union leaders have been appointed as members of the Philippine Congress, as mandated in our Constitution. Some trade union leaders have been appointed also in government agencies whose functions impact directly on workers' welfare. We are lobbying for more labour sectoral representation, especially in economic planning agencies where the voice of labour has to be articulated.

Despite those initial gains, however, the Philippine labour sector still faces a host of problems prevalent in developing countries. Foremost among these are the problems of unemployment, underemployment and low wages.

Low economic growth has consigned 60 per cent of the Filipino people below the accepted poverty threshold. Only 35 per cent of the population own housing and only 30 per cent own land. There is still an inequitable distribution of incomes.

Low economic growth and the constant yearly increase in the labour force has meant the depletion of union ranks through the cyclical retrenchments of workers. Workers in the traditional Philippine export industries like sugar, wood, coconut oil and mining have also been adversely affected by the business cycles and world economic upheavals. These factors have put additional strains on an already harsh labour situation, and threaten to disrupt a relatively peaceful labour-management relations climate over the past few years.

The restructuring of the Philippine economy to make it more competitive with its neighbours in the Asia-Pacific region is also taking its toll on workers. The ongoing privatization programme of the Government threatens the employment of thousands of workers. Significant changes in terms of lower tariffs and foreign exchange liberalization have opened up the economy to a flood of imports. These have resulted in the displacement of workers.

In its campaign to attract foreign investments, the Government has designated specific areas as industrial zones, where free and democratic unions are de facto not allowed to organize. Instead, local government officials in these zones, in cahoots with employers, are sponsoring the formation of workers' associations which are just extensions of their authorities and convenient tools for employers to manipulate to serve their own ends.

Two recent developments have greatly alarmed the labour sector. These are the shift by many employers to contractual agency-based employment and the aggressive promotion of labour-management councils.

Contractual agency-based employment results in the diminution of the organizable or unionizable base of trade unions. Labour-management councils, especially in establishments where there are still no legitimate unions, are being promoted to supplant the formation of real workers' unions. These constitute the most serious deterrents to union organizing in the Philippines.

In its aim to provide some relief to workers in these difficult times, the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines, with the support of other labour organizations, had started a nationwide campaign to raise the national floor wage by 30 per cent. This is to compensate for the real losses in the purchasing power of workers' wages as a result of the double-digit inflation.

Aside from a direct wage increase, the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines, again working with other labour organizations, has made representations with Government and employers for substantial increases in benefits, especially from the state social security agencies. The Government has set aside an initial amount to help those workers who were retrenched as a result of the power shortage. We are confident that this initial effort will later on be transformed into a permanent unemployment insurance programme.

We fully appreciate the continuing support the ILO has extended to efforts by Phillippine trade unions to secure for Filipino workers and their families a better quality of life. Through the ILO's support and encouragement, tripartism has become a recognized institution in our country. The ILO's programmes and activities have broadened our knowledge and expertise in dealing successfully with technical and practical problems and issues concerning our work in the trade union movement.

Let me take this opportunity, however, to make two specific recommendations on the thrust and direction of the ILO's future programmes.

The first is on the promotion of workers' enterprises. We believe that the ILO has much to offer trade unions in countries undergoing economic restructuring in terms of technical support and encouragement in the formation of workers' enterprises. The negative repercussions of privatization, which is almost always opposed by trade unions because of the consequent loss of job security of workers, can be made less harsh through the formation of workers' enterprises out of those state-owned companies which are being privatized.

The second point that I would like to stress is the ILO's role in the global effort to promote sustainable development. Trade unions in developing countries like the Philippines would like to upgrade their knowledge and expertise on how best to contribute their share in the effort to preserve our environment. As a tripartite Organization, composed of government, labour and employer representatives, the ILO is in a unique position to harness its full potential to reverse the tide of global environmental degradation.

Original Spanish: Mr. MARIUS (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) – We join with those who spoke before us in congratulating the President on his election and Mr. Michel Hansenne for his re-election as Director-General of the ILO. We wish him the greatest of success in his second term of office because we are aware of the difficult challenges he has to face in order to preserve and strengthen the ever-more urgent mandate laid down in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution 75 years ago: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice".

Last year, from this same rostrum, the representative of the Government of Brazil dismissed our denunciations of the existence in that country of workers who were subject to a form of slavery.

Today the Governing Body is dealing with the complaint which we have submitted with a great deal of documentation, and the public statement by Mr. Barelli, the present Minister of Labour of Brazil, who – and he is to be praised for this – admits the existence of slave labour in various areas of the country.

We will in the same vein support every effort by the Government of Brazil to eradicate throughout the country any type of work which degrades or injures any human being.

We share the views expressed by the Director-General in his Report, Social insurance and social protection, and particularly his concern over the negative impact of structural adjustment policies.

To these thoughts, we could add others concerning the fate of the contributions of the workers, particularly when reference is made to the "social cost", instead of the inalienable and essential rights of the workers and human beings, earned through work.

We must note that many Latin American countries have used workers' contributions unfairly and corruptly for political purposes, for the privileges of elitist minorities, and to finance bloated state machinery. Now, with privatization rampant, there are proposals to transfer these funds to the private sector, and convert an obligation of the State into an opportunity for private profit.

Like the Director-General, we cannot separate the issue of social security and social protection from the changes taking place in the world, and the adaptation or modernization of our developing countries. In this connection we feel compelled to share a few thoughts and proposals.

First of all, we reject the inevitability of the adaptation and changes which have taken place, and we question the inevitability of present international imbalances.

We find unacceptable the excluding of binding policies in response to realities that are caused by these same policies adopted without consultation.

We are promised many changes in our conditions of poverty and submission, freedom from international economic and social imbalances, as if these were the inevitable results of chance or planetary development.

We consider it an insult to common sense to accept certain realities as inevitable, when we must eradicate their causes where they are incompatible with the principles of this Organization.

It is unacceptable and immoral that we be required to open our markets when protectionism is increasing in the developed countries, as evidenced by the decision of the European Community to close its markets to the imports of bananas from various Latin American countries, leading to tens of thousands of unemployed families.

What is the meaning of the ILO Conventions on employment? What are we asking of the ILO technical cooperation on the subject? How can we deal with the suffering and despair of these families? Is this what we call development? Developments for whom and by whom? And what are we to make of the concept of international social justice?

Secondly, we feel that it is both unrealistic and dangerous to deny the need for in-depth structural changes in our societies and institutions and to do so in the interests of those who have distorted them, without any regard for the needs and legitimate and urgent aspirations of human beings and the whole of mankind.

Here, Latin America can serve as an unfortunate example.

Our leaders accepted a neo-liberal development model as the only alternative to overcome the crisis. The "lost decade" is being followed by a "decade of misery" and poverty by misery and social exclusion, to the detriment of our fragile process of democratization, where 85 per cent of our children suffer from malnutrition, where the basic wage today is two-thirds of what it was in 1980, and where half of the working class survives in the informal sector without any protection, where laws and collective agreements are flouted, where social Darwinism prevails, and where the human being is measured by the standard of the sacrosanct market, and what some pretend is the "invisible" hand. We know whose hand it is.

Thirdly, it is common here to hear about the flowering of democracy and beginning of economic development, reports no doubt fed by Latin American governments.

This is nowhere near the truth. Although we believe that even the worst democracy is better than the best of dictatorships, we must recognize that the struggle of the workers and peoples of Latin America has only achieved certain forms of democracy and some freedom; we must therefore strengthen the process of democratization.

Unfortunately, elected regimes murder, torture and imprison trade union leaders in Peru, Colombia, Guatemala and Haiti among others; in Colombia trade union leaders are condemned as terrorists for fighting for national sovereignty and against the sale of Telecom to transnational interests.

The many assertions of the full respect for workers' right are at odds with the more than 30 complaints of violations submitted since the previous session of the Conference and the denunciations under Article 26 for serious violations of various ILO Conventions.

After so much talk about dialogue, there is no form of economic or social consultation in our region, unless we bow to a so-called modernization which has nothing to do with the humane and legitimate conditions of life and work.

The only thing being developed and growing in Latin America today is poverty and misery. Misery is slavery, and it is not compatible with freedom or true democracy, to which we all aspire as legitimate rights of workers.

Fourthly, with this Conference we begin commemorating the ILO's 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. We consider that this is a good time to re-examine some fundamental aspects. We accept the need and the challenge of a wide-ranging debate at all levels, pluralistic, constructive and creative; it is not by hiding our limitations and incoherences that we will strengthen and render effective our ILO.

We have seen some contributions. There is talk of reforming the ILO. Although we agree as to the need, this statement raises certain doubts. Is reform needed only to adapt to new realities? Must we adapt to situations that have been imposed, or can we ask why they have been imposed? Would it not be better to think about the causes of the new aggressions against men, workers, and human labour, and review the limitations of the ILO in order to overcome them and ensure consistency with our fundamental principles?

If we bear in mind the realities of Latin America, I think we can safely say that we will abandon the inalienable premises of the ILO while "adapting" to "new realities".

There is talk about the "war on poverty, balanced growth of national wealth, and productive employment". It all sounds good, if we have the same definitions. But poverty is not measured by the suffering of increasing numbers of poor, but by government statistics which are not always reliable, and focus exclusively on macro-economic considerations. And development is confused with economic growth, and we workers do not want to hear any more of growth models when we are excluded from consultation on models for the distribution of wealth.

We are told about "human resources development", but education budgets are slashed and illiteracy in Latin America is rising.

We are told about a "climate of freedom and flexibility and promotion of individual initiatives", but reality shows that freedom is a privilege of a few, and flexibility merely eliminates the fundamental rights of human beings, and individual initiative is only for the benefit of financial capital, not human capital.

We who represent the workers' interest, cannot tie ourselves up in secondary interests. We must bear in mind and strive for the objectives of the ILO, rather than adapt to a reality which every day recedes from those objectives.

At the 10th Conference of our Central and the 23rd Congress of the WCL, we will complete a series of studies and finalize our proposals to respond to the suffering realities of Latin America and of all the workers of the world.

Original Polish: Mrs. SPYCHALSKA (Workers' delegate, Poland) – I have the honour, on behalf of the delegation of Polish trade unions, to congratulate the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Let me first express our satisfaction with the excellent cooperation that is developing between the International Labour Organization and the Polish Trade Union Alliance.

In my presentation I will concentrate on the major issues which have to be resolved by the Polish trade union movement. These tasks are far from easy, if we remember that during the past four years our country has gone through a major transformation of its political and economic system, from a centrally controlled economy towards a market economy.

The fact that this process is taking place in a technically and technologically underdeveloped environment leads to an accumulation of economic difficulties and social conflicts.

The frustration of our people is aggravated by practices of the political camp which took over power in the 1989 parliamentary elections, with wide support from the workers. They were unable to fulfil their promises of rapid improvement in living standards of those who earn their living from work. On the contrary, this period was dominated by a slump in production and available jobs.

Unemployment had risen to a level unknown so far in this part of Europe in the post-war period. Purchasing power is systematically falling.

The present situation in Poland has thus led to public dissatisfaction, feelings of insecurity and uncertainty. The country is disrupted by regular waves of strikes and protests initiated by a variety of occupational groups and sectors of the national economy.

Obviously, such an explosive social situation requires the trade unions to reemerge as a power which, on the one hand expresses the interests of employees and their families, and on the other, does not shrink from assuming responsibility for the future of the people and the State. Frequent cabinet changes resulting in friction between political factions make this task far from easy.

Some politicians persevere in advocating concepts and ideas for a rapid introduction of the free market principle into all spheres of the economy and public life, irrespective of the costs and burdens which oppress entire occupational groups.

The "transformation through liquidation" methodology has spread to entire industrial sectors. Unemployment is soaring to 20 per cent and more. It is expected that the total unemployment in Poland will reach 3 million by the end of this year, with 1.2 million persons being deprived of unemployment benefits. This poses one of the main problems and challenges we have to resolve and led to the Polish Trade Union Alliance being forced to submit a complaint to the ILO. In our opinion such a situation violates Convention No. 122, which has been ratified by Poland.

This situation is the result of poor economic policies adopted by successive Polish Governments which neglected to stimulate the economy. Neither did those Governments give a fair treatment to the state-owned, cooperative and private sectors. The first of these two are now labouring under high taxes, which have no relation with economic production.

The lack of cooperation between the main trade unions makes it difficult to counter these policies. One such union until recently not only created political elites but shielded them with a protective umbrella. No wonder that the Polish Trade Union Alliance, which has more members, was pushed aside by the Government.

The divergent position of the two biggest trade unions and as the conflict between them are the result of political factors and not so-called trade union property.

Once again I should like to state from this rostrum that the Polish Trade Union Alliance did not "appropriate" Solidarnosc property in 1985. The property was taken by the State and a portion of that property was transferred to some of our organizations.

The financial assets of Solidarnosc are deposited in a bank account. The whole sum plus bank interest await the rightful owner. It is a pity that Solidarnosc is expecting from the Polish Trade Union Alliance a huge amount which has multiplied nearly 200 times. This gives us the conviction that they are intent on eliminating us, contrary to Polish law, international regulations and international labour standards.

Notwithstanding these difficulties and restrictions, Polish trade unions are taking a number of responsible initiatives aimed at solving the existing difficulties. For example, the Pact on State-owned enterprises. Recently, some political parties have suggested restricting trade union rights, which is a violation of international labour standards ratified by Poland.

The right to strike, which is enjoyed by trade unions through the world, is seen by us as an ultimate measure. We believe that the best way of resolving problems and challenges is by tripartite agreement between the Government, employers and employees, with the goodwill and cooperation of all participants.

I hope that this session of the International Labour Conference will make a significant contribution to the dialogue, understanding and partnership-based cooperation between governments, employers and workers, as an example for the future.

We have noted with satisfaction the ratification by Poland of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and we are disgusted at the lack of willingness shown by trade union partners to act in the well-deserved interest of the working class.

The Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO, which will celebrate its 75th anniversary in 1994, meets with our full support. We support the technical cooperation programme in the interests of the working people. Therefore, my organization has undertaken a wide ranging discussion with the Government and signed the so-called "Charter of Public and Social Guarantees", which will help us resolve now and in the future such basic social problems as the right to work, wages, health protection, unemployment, housing, education and culture, as well as a new of social security system.

Recession is hitting a number of wealthy countries and their experiences in resolving these problems are of great interest to us. The transformation taking place in Eastern Europe has one feature in common – the fact that it is accompanied by major economic difficulties. This severely jeopardizes the standard of living of workers and generates social conflict and protest which threaten the logic of change. Therefore, in our opinion, help in overcoming these problems is not only the responsibility of national trade unions but one which falls on the shoulders of parliaments, governments and employers at in the international level.

Original French: Mrs. SAMOYA KIKURA (Government delegate, Burundi) – May I be allowed on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Burundi to join the speakers who have spoken before me at this rostrum in addressing my sincere congratulations to the President and to the other Officers for their very well-deserved election at this session of the International Labour Conference. The dedication of Egypt to the ILO's objectives is well known and I am convinced that the experience, competence and wisdom of the President will enable our debates to be led to a fortunate conclusion.

It is also appropriate here to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for having been re-elected for another term of office. We express our esteem to him and to his staff for the objectivity and topicality of the themes presented in so masterly a fashion to this assembly for analysis.

Before submitting to this distinguished assembly my delegation's contribution to the discussion of the Director-General's Report, I should like to say that the Republic of Burundi is experiencing in-depth transformations towards the democratization of its political and institutional system. Two years after the adoption of the National Unity Charter and one year after the promulgation of a Constitution which sets forth the principles of this Charter and of a multiparty system, presidential elections have just taken place, bringing the first civilian head of state since independence to lead the country.

Legislative elections are scheduled for the end of June and they will involve the competition of 11 political parties which are now active on the Burundi political scene.

This visiting card is accompanied by the desire for better management of national resources by means of a programme of adjustment which gives prominence to the social dimension, in particular with respect to the most vulnerable social categories.

A revision of legislative texts including the Labour Code and the public service statute with a view to adapting them to the present situation will, we are sure, permit the promotion and better management of employment policies, objectives so very dear to the heart of the International Labour Organization.

The International Labour Organization is the first organization in the UN system to have made the protection of the individual, his rights and his dignity its constant concern.

At the present time, the labour world is faced with problems which are just as serious as those which existed when the ILO was created, and we are celebrating the 75th anniversary next year. We could mention, inter alia, the general economic crisis, structural adjustment, demographic trends, unemployment due to new technologies.

Thus, there are adverse effects on the standard of living as well as on access to goods and essential services for the population and, to a lesser extent, for the workers, bearing in mind all the sectors of the country. These effects are felt unequally depending on whether we are dealing with developed or developing countries.

In the field of social insurance and social protection, the Director-General's Report brilliantly describes the situation of the developing countries and in particular those of Africa, including Burundi.

The delegation of my Government shares the views of the Director-General when he says with respect to developing countries that "The social security institutions charged with the management of the schemes are often deficient, not only in terms of their operating functions (which tend to be excessively expensive) but in terms of their financial management and their ability to pay benefits promptly or in full."

However, it is obvious that a higher standard of living is a worldwide concern and that most of the developing contries are stinting no efforts to increase their chances of achieving it.

Unfortunately this is not the only problem facing us nowadays. There are still, on the one hand, differences in the rights of those who should have those rights and, on the other hand, inequalities of opportunity.

In my country, social security goes back to the advent of Burundi to national sovereignty some 30 years ago. But the country still has not acceded to the minimum standards set forth in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102), adopted by the ILO in 1952.

Coverage of occupational risks (work injuries, work-related illnesses) and old-age benefits only applies to the formal sector which comprises an insignificant proportion (4 per cent) of the active population in my country.

Civil servants and magistrates are governed by the public sector statute and are not insured against occupational risks, nor are employees in the private sector covered by sickness insurance. Employers are still entirely responsible for the latter's health care despite the heavy burden this represents for their already limited budgets.

Nevertheless, it is fortunate to note that, in my country, a system of sickness insurance has been organized for the benefit of the rural population which although it does not provide pharmaceutical products gives the right to medical consultations and treatment.

The extension of social security systems in the developing countries cannot be dissociated from economic, political and social development as a whole.

This is where – as the Director-General has so rightly said – more coordination of political direction is required, not only between the ILO and its many technical departments, but also with the governments, the social partners and the populations of the countries concerned and also with the international community as a whole.

Within this framework Burundi has already begun studies which should lead to the extension of benefits to civil servants and magistrates in cases of industrial accidents or work-related illnesses; social security cover to provide family and maternity benefits; and to the institution of a system of sickness insurance in the formal sector.

I should like to seize this opportunity to express the sincere thanks of my Government to the ILO and its technical department for the support given my country in the course of carrying out all these studies.

These strategies, in particular those affecting the extension of protection and improvement of benefits, the increase of benefits and of the number of beneficiaries, the reform and management of social security institutions, certainly require a considerable dose of international cooperation.

Much imagination will have to be made use of, but the most relevant suggestions could as well come from the interested parties themselves as from foreign experts.

Thus, and I have no doubt of this whatsoever, the Organization will continue to support its Members and particularly those which are still developing so that the results expected will be achieved.

With respect to the second part of the Director-General's Report dealing with the ILO's activities for the year 1992, Burundi is happy to see the excellent relations and cooperation between its Government and the ILO and projects benefiting from the support of the ILO are developing to our great satisfaction; consultation missions supported by it have been extremely efficient.

This cooperation can be noted in such important sectors as labour standards, employment, training and labour administration and social security.

My Government notes with much satisfaction that the ILO has, among the new technical cooperation projects approved in 1992, decided to finance the setting up of labour inspection offices in Burundi. My country will make every effort so that the project can be quickly and fully implemented.

We reiterate our wishes that this cooperation should be further strengthened so as to support our efforts towards development.

Nobody can deny that the implementation of the programme of activities of our Organization and the diversification of its activities should be supported by the respect of its Members for their obligations, including the actual payment of their contributions. Despite all its numerous problems, Burundi has bowed to this imperative by paying up all its arrears in the course of this year, 1993.

Before I finish my statement I would like to express the urgent appeal of my country to all the member States of our Organization to strive to eliminate apartheid and racism in South Africa and to restore peace in the former State of Yugoslavia, in the occupied Arab territories, in Somalia and in the other areas of tension. Survival of peace in Africa and in the world depends on this.

This year in which we are preparing to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, the international community must make further efforts in order to combat discrimination in all its forms in the different areas of the world.

I do hope that the international efforts deployed for this purpose will be duly rewarded so that people who have been deprived so long of peace, liberty and justice may reconquer the rights for which they have so bravely struggled.

Finally, I would renew my wish that the work of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference will lead to results which will be greatly satisfactory to its Members and to all the delegations participating in this Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Presidents: Mr. Tabani and Mr. Badey

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I should first like to convey to you the best wishes of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait and of the entire business community of the State of Kuwait. I should also like to offer my warmest congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election, which is a mark of appreciation of their wisdom and competence. I wish them every success in their work.

My heartiest congratulations also to the Director-General of the ILO on the occasion of his re-election. I wish him every success in running the Organization over the next five years.

With this session, our Conference will have completed the eighth decade of its prestigious history. For 80 years it has had to bear on its shoulders many of the troubles and cares of humanity, sometimes as a witness, sometimes as a legislator and often as a defender of human rights and a custodian of the freedom and security of the individual.

This year, the Report of the Director-General deals with social insurance and social protection, a judicious choice of subject although the success of such an enterprise depends on the scope of the Report and the courage with which the topic is addressed.

Social security should not consist solely in guaranteeing a source of income for individuals and families, making provision for health care, insuring against disability, old age and death and alleviating the impact of structural adjustment. Neither should it be limited to societies left unscathed by international violence and by the conflicts which are on the increase throughout the world in the early 1990s. The societies that have had the misfortune to be the scene of conflicts and wars find their achievements and the structures built up over a period of decades suddenly demolished, as happened in the case of the social security establishments in my country, Kuwait, during the barbaric invasion.

Since independence our State has developed extremely ambitious and generous institutions for all kinds of social protection, culminating in 1977 with the setting up of an independent public body and an ambitious social insurance scheme for all civilian workers and protecting against old age, disability, sickness and death. The liberal professions were also covered by the scheme. I would have liked the Director-General, who visited my country immediately after its liberation in May 1991, to have mentioned in his Report the damage incurred by our social insurance scheme after the invasion.

The Report of the Director-General, entitled Social insurance and social protection, is in our view incomplete. We would have liked it to respond more closely to our aspirations and to the needs of certain regions of the world where all principles and values are being flagrantly violated at the present time, for example the ethnic conflict being waged in Bosnia and Herzegovina against the long-suffering Muslims, who are the victims of a genocidal war in which all kinds of abominations are permitted: murder, arson, rape, burying people alive. All of this and more is going on every day and is reported in the media. How can we talk about social protection and social insurance in the case of these poor victims? This great Conference, representing the public and private sectors of the international community, bears moral responsibility before it bears historical responsibility and should not stand idly by in the face of this catastrophic situation.

The ILO has a special duty to assume responsibility for monitoring the conflicts taking place in different parts of the world and for assessing their adverse implications for human rights through their impact on economic activity and development, the use of human resources, the stability of all kinds of labour relationships, the provision of means of social protection and security and in other areas of concern to the ILO's tripartite constituents.

In his Report, the Director-General has outlined the history of social insurance systems, in particular in the developing countries, and has linked their development to the type of colonialism imposed on them during that last period. One may ask what is the real relationship between colonialism and social insurance. In our view, the Director-General has simply highlighted historical realities. This Report is nevertheless very interesting, although we would have liked it to deal with the experiences of certain developing countries who have developed very interesting social security and social insurance schemes.

We were interested in what appears on page 78 in the Report with respect to the links between greater participation by women in the labour market and the growing number of divorces. If the Director-General believes that the phenomenon exists, then in our view, the Governing Body and indeed this Conference should devote particular attention to it.

With regard to the reinstatement of workers who have left the world of work we would have liked to see proposals to encourage these individuals to establish small or medium-sized enterprises in the private sector and to run them, which would also create employment for others. In any case, Kuwait has followed the guidelines outlined by the Director-General in his Report since liberation, concerning the reintegration of workers since it has great need of a national workforce.

In that part of the Report dealing with unemployment insurance and safety nets in countries undergoing structural adjustment, the Director-General made a number of interesting comments, the implementation of which could create social and economic difficulties in some countries if they were to entail major sacrifices. In this respect, the ILO could play a major part in helping its Members find appropriate solutions to their economic and social problems. We also wanted the Report to discuss the informal sector. In our view, linking the informal sector with the issue of insurance could hinder economic and social development. It might therefore be more appropriate to link social assistance with initiatives by young people to set up small and medium-sized firms in the private sector.

Still on the subject of the Director-General's Report, let me say that what is successful in one country will not necessarily be successful in other countries. The Director-General recognized this fact when he pointed out on page 75 of the Report that certain novel systems had led to the emergence of a category known as the "new poor."

I should like to refer briefly to the Report by the Governing Body, and to congratulate all its members and wish them every success in the direction of their future work. The Governing Body has made great efforts recently and, thanks to earnest discussions, has been able to undertake a number of major reforms in the work of the Governing Body and of the Conference in the light of their historical responsibility.

The Report speaks at length of basic rights and freedoms. One should mention the excellent work that has been done by one of the most important committees of the Governing Body, namely the Committee on Freedom of Association. We would like to see its terms of reference expanded, especially with regard to its contacts with certain member States, to allow it to receive answers on all questions which it puts to States and ensure that all countries apply more rigorously the recommendations made by the Governing Body. Both the Governing Body and the Committee have an important role to play in monitoring the application of Recommendations, without allowing procrastination as in Case No. 1556 concerning the complaint filed by Kuwait against the Iraqi regime.

Allow me also to say that one can never conceal the truth, however much one tries. I refer here to the false allegations made at the end of Provisional Record No. 8.

In conclusion, I would like to thank everyone present for their attention. I hope you will join me in my prayers that the Kuwaiti prisoners held in Iraqi prisons will be released.

Mr. SKLEDAR (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Slovenia) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on their election.

I would also like to express my congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the excellent Report on Social insurance and social protection which he has put before the Conference and for his re-election as Director-General of the ILO.

In these times of economic crisis, especially acute in Central and Eastern Europe, one can hear many state that social protection systems and the required financial resources are among the main causes of this crisis. They are challenging the existence of these systems as such, while others are proposing the forms known in the first part of this century. Cuts in state budgets have been made, and are still being proposed, together with a lowering of benefits, at a time when social crisis is accompanying the economic crisis, and the need for expansion of social policy programmes is growing. We can see, both at home and in the ILO, that employers are intensifying their pressure against labour standards and conditions of work and life.

The argumentation is, for example, that the lowering of unemployment benefits is a good incentive for the unemployed to look for new jobs. This is being argued at a time when unemployment is rising sharply and opportunities for finding new jobs are diminishing.

Of course, social protection systems in Central and Eastern Europe must be reformed. But the reformers should not forget that access to social protection is a basic human right and that in order to prevent hardship the acceptable level of welfare of the population is a legitimate goal first of all in itself. It should also be kept in mind that, as the Director-General stated in his Report, and I quote: "... the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all individuals and households enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and to accept change, and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability. Furthermore, entitlement to adequate levels of social protection is recognized explicitly in several international Declarations dealing with the matter, and in the various international labour standards on social security (and related issues)".

Social security systems in Slovenia have been reformed to a great extent but are now suffering because of economic decline. For example, the level and duration of unemployment benefits were reduced and now these benefits have reached a very low level. Is the argument that this is consistent with the economic situation of the country and that resources must be devoted to new investments valid in the context, when high unemployment rates will persist for a long time and when expenditure on training, retraining and employment promotion measures are also restricted? On the one hand, spending on social protection should be given at least equal priority as productive investment.

And, following further the suggestion of the Director-General in his Report to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference last year, one part of the solution on a global scale would be to effect substantial savings on defence budgets and to allocate these resources to social protection. This is possible because of new political situations and détente.

For Slovenia, one of the most important parts of the solution to this problem would be economic growth by the promotion of its integration in the world economy through trade and technical cooperation promotion and not by custom barriers. Here, the conclusion of a European agreement with the European Community would be of great value.

Trade unions in Slovenia support the conclusions of the meeting of the International Organization of Employers and of the ICFTU in April 1992, where both organizations highlight the importance of reforming and developing social security systems in Central and Eastern Europe in order to protect those adversely affected in the transition process. They state also that such reform should include mechanisms for the involvement of trade unions and employers in the design and management of social security systems. Otherwise, the lack of adequate social security systems, rapidly rising unemployment and continuing reductions in the purchasing power of wages will cause the reform process in Central and Eastern Europe to lose momentum, putting in jeopardy not only the economic transition but also the breakthrough to democracy.

In Slovenia, tripartite cooperation and decision-making has already been established in health insurance, old-age and invalidity insurance and in the field of unemployment. All three partners are represented in decision-making bodies of relevant institutions; in some bodies, other interest groups too. On the trade union side there are representatives from different trade unions. In spite of the existence of trade union pluralism in Slovenia, trade unions have reached a considerable unity of action in these fields. In addition, the establishment of a tripartite, social and economic consultative body is in the initial phase of preparation. New labour and social legislation is also being prepared by consulting social partners.

In this context, the importance of workers' education must be stressed. Slovene trade unions are grateful to the ILO Workers' Education Branch for its help, and stress that the resources for this kind of technical cooperation must expand.

In addition to these problems, Slovenia also has a considerable number of refugees from Bosnia. If the international community cannot agree on how to solve the problem of Bosnia, then at least it can do more to make the life of the refugees easier. The prospects for their return home are very small. In the near future, especially, the majority of young refugees will want to work, not only to improve their living standard. For them, meaningful activity is important in order to make them feel that their life is meaningful and to give themselves a positive self-image. As concerns rising unemployment, Slovenia will not be able to solve the problem alone and assistance from the international community will obviously be needed.

Mr. BREWSTER (Government delegate, Barbados) – I should like to join previous speakers and congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election to the office of Director-General for a second term. We wish him every success in his most challenging job.

This session of the Conference, through its discussions and with its conclusions on a range of subjects on the agenda, will contribute appreciably towards the realization of the principal objectives of the Organization which are respect for basic human rights and social justice.

The Barbados delegation notes the initiatives being taken in restructuring the delivery of technical services offered by the International Labour Organization. Certain aspects of this new thrust deserve commendation; in particular, the use of local consultants engaged in the development, implementation and evaluation of projects, which ensures that projects are more relevant to the specific needs of the country.

In this regard, my delegation also wishes to express appreciation for the ready response of the ILO in providing the Government of Barbados with a consultant in the area of productivity. We are all keenly aware of the importance which must be assigned to this subject, especially during these times of economic uncertainty.

In Barbados we have established a National Productivity Board which is setting criteria for the measurement of productivity in all sectors of the economy. We have started survey and data collection work in the hotel and manufacturing sectors, which are the leading sectors of the Barbados economy. We expect that our efforts will bear some fruit in enhancing productivity in these sectors.

Changes in the international economic and social environment and in the needs and priorities of developing countries have important and far-reaching implications for labour legislation, labour management relations, working conditions, employment and, indeed, labour administration policies.

The International Labour Organization must therefore better equip itself to deepen its cooperation with the governments and other social partners of developing countries, in finding new structures and new solutions to these new problems. Regrettably, the ILO, like other United Nations agencies, has to accomplish its task in a climate of financial constraint which member States of the ILO are themselves experiencing.

My delegation recognizes that this situation puts considerable pressure on the Organization in meeting its projected plans and commitments; but this should encourage the ILO to find more creative, effective and efficient ways of meeting the urgent needs of its member States.

The use of the subregional multidisciplinary team being promoted by the ILO is one approach which has some merit; but my delegation would caution that this approach if applied in all circumstances might become counterproductive. The establishment of subregional multidisciplinary teams to replace regional centres must ultimately result in fundamental changes in the nature and delivery of services to some member States.

In the Caribbean region we have developed a highly specialized centre dealing with labour administration for the various islands in the region. The Caribbean Labour Administration Centre, which is based in Barbados, has for several years been engaged in institution building and the strengthening of institutional capabilities through seminars, workshops, symposia and training courses.

The work of the Centre is considered critical by Caribbean governments, particularly now that labour is under stress from structural adjustment and stabilization programmes. The ILO is closing this Centre at the end of June 1993. The Caribbean Labour Ministers, at their recent meeting in May 1992 in St. Lucia, expressed grave concern that the replacement of the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre, within the ambit of these multidisciplinary teams, will not provide the effective results which the subregion requires at this juncture.

Let me emphasize that the Barbados delegation is not insensitive to the financial situation of the ILO, and hence the need to cut costs where feasible. However, there is no overwhelming evidence that considerable savings on recurrent costs will accompany the closure of the Centre. For certainly the funds that are now made available to the Centre for activities will be absorbed into the recurrent costs of maintaining the multidisciplinary team which will be relocated elsewhere.

In addition, because of the small numbers comprising the multidisciplinary team, its activities will appear to be limited to analytical work, with advisory services and technical backstopping for projects and programmes being executed by the countries themselves. There is therefore some lingering doubt that, on a cost benefit basis, the countries to be served will do as well as or better than before the closure of the Centre.

The Barbados delegation endorses the approach taken by the Director-General in his Programme and Budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium. We note that the overall increase in the provision of the 1992-93 biennium is modest. We also note that there has been an increase in the allocation for field programmes in the American region.

My delegation supports the priority objectives as outlined, covering such areas as the consolidation of democracy through the wider promotion of basic standards, the development and consolidation of tripartite machinery, the strengthening of the capacity of ILO constituents as regards economic integration in the region and the strengthening of national capacity to design employment training policies and programmes to deal with structural adjustment and technological changes affecting the labour market.

The Barbados delegation supports the discussion on the subject of part-time work. Structural adjustment programmes and their social consequences, particularly in the area of the dislocation of labour, have led many employers to be attracted to part-time work. This may be viewed as a stepping stone to full and regular employment and helps to spread the available employment more widely, thus reducing the number of unemployed persons on the labour market.

But care has to be taken that these new employment relationships being instituted by employers do not disadvantage the worker or compromise his rights to full-time work and the attendant benefits therefrom.

The matter of social protection is of great interest to my delegation. The social costs which accompany any adjustment programme are particularly problematic and bruising to governments, because unemployment levels increase dramatically, while the support which governments can offer to their disadvantaged citizens is severely weakened.

Social protection measures are designed to cushion economic and social distress which result from factors such as job loss, illness, employment injury, old-age and the like.

Indeed, social security systems have increasingly come under pressure from contributions by a reduced workforce while at the same time having to cope with the increasing numbers of claims from the unemployed. In this regard, governments in developing countries have to look to see how best they can rationalize this difficult situation. It is clear that some redesigning of the social security machinery must be given priority consideration.

The prevention of major industrial accidents has always been of great importance to my country. Barbados is aware of the fact that protection of workers from occupational accidents and diseases is one of the most urgent aspects of the improvement of the working environment.

Barbados has therefore supported action aimed at the protection of the health and the promotion of the safety of the worker, and has introduced legislative and other measures to deal with this issue. Our objective is to reduce substantially the number of industrial accidents occurring in the workforce.

We have also established a National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety and Health, which among other things advises the Government on programmes in the field of occupational safety and health, policies and procedures and standard-setting.

The National Advisory Committee has an important role in terms of education in the area of occupational safety and health. The Committee organizes safety and health programmes on a tripartite basis where issues related to safety in the workplace are discussed and analysed and solutions found for the various problems. We hope to continue receiving assistance from the ILO in this important aspect of labour management in our country.

In closing, the Barbados delegation wishes to reaffirm its full cooperation in furthering the work of the Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. GAZARIN (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. I am very pleased to congratulate the President on behalf of Egyptian workers and myself on his election to preside over this session of the Conference. I know that under his guidance we will certainly achieve our objectives.

I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, and in particular Mr. Tabani, Employers' delegate of Pakistan, who was elected unanimously to the post of Employers' Vice-President.

Egypt is one of the first developing countries to have fallen in with the current trend and to have taken interim measures aimed at moving from a system characterized by centralized planning and state control over enterprises, and production to a free market economy which depends on the private sector to ensure development.

This all began in 1974 with the adoption of a policy of economic openness, encouraging both national and foreign investment. Subsequently, important milestones were passed at the beginning of the 1990s when the Egyptian State floated the currency and allowed free trade and investment in the various areas of economic activity. All this has had a positive impact on the private sector which played an effective role in the country's economic development and in increasing both Arab and foreign investment in Egypt.

What has also encouraged this process has been the interim plan announced by the Government which aimed to limit the role of the public sector and heralded the sale of some public sector enterprises operating in the spheres of industry, tourism and services. Due to all these initiatives it became clear that Egyptian employers' organizations and of course the Federation of Egyptian Industries have a very important role to play at this important stage in terms of representing the private sector and defending their interests and participating as a full partner in the process of development.

I should like to express my appreciation for the assistance given by the ILO to the Federation of Egyptian Industries. Following a preliminary study in Egypt an ILO expert drew up a comprehensive report on what the Federation of Egyptian Industries could do to become stronger and more effective.

The ILO also set up visits for the President of the association to similar federations elsewhere.

All of this contributed to the present development of the Federation of Egyptian Industries. This cooperation between the employers' association and the ILO was a shining example of the relations which can be forged between the ILO and employers' associations in developing countries.

I would also like to mention the aid provided by the ILO in improving the Labour Code in Egypt by establishing a tripartite commission within which the public authorities, employers and workers could revise completely labour legislation with a view to drafting a more consistent and suitable document for this stage in economic transition. In December of last year, I had an opportunity to take part in an African employers' conference in Dakar. The discussion focused on this transitional period, as we move towards market economies, and on the role of employers' associations at this time.

During this conference, a number of problems affecting the African continent were highlighted, namely, unemployment, which is rampant in most African countries and poverty which continues to increase as a result of scarce resources, and mismanagement. Also it became clear that the employers' organizations in many African countries were inadequate and that they were in need of assistance to help their development and enable them to play their rightful role in the next stage. This is where the ILO has a major role to play, along with the International Employers' Organization, in helping us to progress and providing support.

We are following with great attention the policy adopted by the Director-General of the ILO with the support of the Governing Body aimed at entrusting basic responsibility for the provision of technical aid and assistance to the tripartite offices to be set up in different regions, five of them in Africa. We hope that these offices will make technical cooperation more efficient and better adapted to prevailing conditions and to the real needs of the regions where they are located.

We also hope that the Organization of African Employers will play a major role, in cooperation with these offices, in strengthening the participation of employers in the economic development of the African continent.

We were pleased with the participation of the Organization of African Employers in the OAU Labour Commission which met in Cairo in April 1993 after adopting a tripartite structure. This is an important step which will enhance the standing of the Organization and its role in Africa.

We also expect a great deal from the OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government to be held in Cairo this month, at which African leaders will be able to take note of the effective contribution that employers' organizations can make to economic development.

I cannot conclude this part of my statement dealing with Africa without casting an optimistic glance towards South Africa, which is really proceeding towards the abolition of the abhorrent system of apartheid. We hope that this year will be the last in which the Committee on Apartheid has to meet. We welcome the delegation of business people from South Africa, who came here as observers and who represent black and white organizations on an equal footing. I hope that their country will soon become a full Member of the Organization.

The role to be played by the ILO and the IOE during the next state is of paramount importance and we will certainly see an increase in the activities of the two organizations on behalf of the three parties during this transitional period, in which the countries of the world are moving towards a better international community where freedom, peace and prosperity prevail.

May the peace, the mercy and the blessings of God be upon you.

Original German: Mr. ENGLIS (Workers' delegate, Slovakia) – Allow me to address you on this my first time at the International Labour Conference as a representative of the largest trade union confederation of Slovakia. The process of transformation from a centrally planned to a market economy brings in its wake threat to the social situation of workers including, of course, our members. In this connection, the continuing concern shown by the International Labour Organization for the protection of labour and its recognition of the importance of the workers are a great source of support for us. We also very much appreciate the attention given by this Organization to the development of social welfare systems during the structural changes and transformations of our economy.

All this is reflected in Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General on the activities of the ILO and was made even clearer by the holding of a seminar by ILO experts for our specialists. The recognition of the problems of social security in member States of the ILO is a source of inspiration and information which is of great help to us in the shaping of our own social reforms. The Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovakia considers it a priority in its relations with the International Labour Organization to ensure that in the future there will be full respect of all already adopted and ratified international labour Conventions, and we shall also ensure that they are incorporated into the national legislation of Slovakia.

Changes in political law following the separation of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic into two independent States – the Slovak Republic and the Czech Republic – and economic developments during the first few months of this year created considerable tensions in Slovak society. It is with concern that the Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovakia has been following developments both in the social situation of the most vulnerable population groups and in the state economy. We have not yet managed fully to create the necessary basis for a revival in the country's economic life. Our concern has been further intensified by the fact that there are difficulties of communication between the Government and the trade unions. Increasingly cases are arising in which decisions by the Executive do not take into consideration recommendations made in relation to the compromises entered into by the three social parties in the Tripartite Council.

The reservations of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovakia concerning social change refer in particular to the absence of a carefully thoughtout and uniform reform of the social system, the absence of any overall employment policy and the underestimation of specific aspects of these problems.

The Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovakia has only in recent weeks developed a position on transformation in the social sphere and it is its intention to outline that position at its Second Congress to be held on 24-25 June of this year in the capital of Slovakia. Here a programme document will be adopted which will take into account the economic and social context resulting from the creation of an independent Slovakia.

In the spheres of labour relations, collective bargaining and employment, we are giving priority to extension and strengthening of the principle of contractual freedom in labour relations, and the strengthening of the role of collective agreements and bargaining, the granting of a realistic level of income, respect for the ban on forced labour, as well as cooperation with the social partners.

In the social sphere, the Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovakia is prepared to give its support to the creation of an insurance system under public law and the application of the principle of transparency of income as regards the insurance carriers, and the creation of a state social assistance scheme within the framework of which the State will provide subsidies and support for child welfare and for citizens who do not have the necessary income to meet their basic needs.

All this, of course, is only a very brief outline of our programme.

I would, however, like to assure you that we firmly stand by our position as defenders of democracy – defenders of the rights and claims of the workers and our members. Furthermore, the assistance, support and aid of the ILO in solving the above-mentioned problems will be of very great importance.

Slovak participation in mutual and reciprocal cooperation has been put into practice by the expansion of our Institute for Trade Union Education in Bratislava as a central training institute for all trade unionists and employers in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, under the patronage of the ILO.

Original German: Mrs. ENGELEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) – We now face the greatest economic and social challenges since the end of the Second World War.

The right to social security and a life of dignity, laid down in ILO standards, is denied to the large majority of humanity, more particularly in the developing countries, but not only there. What is particularly frightening is that ethnic conflicts and xenophobia are growing potentially more explosive. It is frightening to see how, in my country as well, violence is growing against foreigners.

Admittedly, the problems of the wealthy North are not comparable with those of the South which threaten existence itself.

But even in the rich industrial countries social problems have recently become more acute. Unfortunately, in the Report of the Director-General this is hardly touched upon. In the member States of the EC, for example, the proportion of those receiving unemployment benefits fell during the 1980s because of cuts. The average in the EC is already under the 50 per cent mark.

After the fall of active socialism certain social forces feel strengthened which wish in fact to dismantle social standards. Thus, even in the rich countries of the West, increasing numbers of people are forced into poverty. Even in the industrialized countries there are serious shortcomings in health care. As before, the sad fact is that if you are poor you will die sooner. In my country, for example, more than half of the workers have to retire early because of early invalidity. Since the population is ageing and family ties have limits, new systems will have to be developed for those cases where people must turn to outside help in old age when they need care.

As regards the setting up of such a system of guaranteed care, there is considerable disagreement. The dangerous issue here in this discussion is that solidarity between different social groups is more and more being called into question by those who wish to dismantle our social system.

We are also dealing with social problems which are categorized as "individualization". That is to say old social ties are loosened both within and outside the family. As a result of the traditional division of labour, women very frequently find themselves covered by the system of social protection via their economically active husbands. What is now needed is that women as well as men should have an independent legal right to social protection.

In the light of the chronically empty coffers, new concepts of funding must be created particularly to guarantee social welfare. The traditional taxes and contributions should be supplemented by, for example, the value added tax. In our country too, social security receipts are partly diverted to other public spending, as is stated in the Director-General's Report with respect to some developing countries, where they are used not for social, but military purposes.

Although social policy needs a new impetus, it is falling increasingly into a defensive position. In many countries of the North, there is an increasing trend to place the social burden of unemployment and economic adjustment programmes first and foremost on those social groups which are at the lower end of the income scale. In this way it is hoped to gain a competitive edge on one's neighbour.

This could, however, very rapidly lead to a downward spiral for all of us, as we have already seen once before in the past. The most important lesson from the past should therefore be, particularly in time of crisis, that the weaker groups in a population should enjoy preferential treatment, and that the ranks of the poor should not be swollen by cutting benefits.

In the shaping of social policy economic factors can, of course, not be ignored. But welfare provisions are not only cost factors. Rather they create a positive environment for economic development. Economic and social goals must be mutually supportive. In my country, for example, the direct costs of industrial accidents amount to more than DM30 billion, say some US$20 billion. The cost of industrial disease is much higher. These enormous sums could in the long term be saved by preventive social policy. One cannot repeat enough that preventive protection of workers and investment in the health and qualifications of human beings is beyond all doubt the most productive.

It is extremely disappointing, for example, to see that a large number of industrialized countries have not even ratified the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102). This Convention makes in fact relatively modest demands and in fact allows for ratification by stages.

The Report of the Director-General is also laconic about specific proposals and action for the developing countries. It is a truism that the social security systems of industrial countries cannot be transferred wholesale to developing countries, nor should they be. This is an experience we in Germany have had to face as a result of reunification, particularly in the light of developments in the eastern part of Germany. In the light of the horrifying extent of poverty, particularly in Africa, and the degrading misery in which a large proportion of humanity lives even today, it is urgent to find solutions through actions of solidarity. Humanity has never had so many resources at its disposal to fight hunger and poverty. We can only succeed in this tremendous task, however, if we can mobilize the necessary common political will.

We have to face the central issue of whether the ILO, in trying to eliminate poverty, injustice and misery, can and should continue to play a leading role in the future. If we say yes, as I do, we must fight the battle ever more fiercely, and our activities must go beyond past concepts.

The war on mass poverty and inadequate social protection has to be waged on many fronts. I believe it is desirable in this field of traditional responsibility of the ILO to set up a specific programme of action. Here, for example, we could include such elements as the following:

First of all differentiated analyses of differences in wage trends; second, proposals that take account of the basic needs of the poorest classes of society, in particular the creation of jobs and guaranteed food supplies; third, proposals and assistance in the development of pension schemes. At the same time programmes of population policy and family planning should be strengthened because if we continue with absolutely inadequate and often dishonest population policies, we are faced with catastrophe; fourth, we must take vigorous steps to ensure that closer attention is paid to the social aspects of structural adjustment measures, particularly by the World Bank and the IMF; fifth, programmes should be devised to develop socio-political preventive institutions in the developing countries, and guidelines for the transfer of technology which takes into consideration the health of the workers, technology which the developing countries are urged to adopt; here the multinationals of course should be involved; sixth, plans should be made for reducing the administrative costs of social systems and improving their efficiency; seventh, it is absolutely essential for the trade unions and the employers to participate in the design of social security systems and their decisions. Regular information should be provided where social security institutions have to participate in the financing of other public expenditure and corruption is to be avoided.

Solidarity must extend over and beyond national borders. The hope for an international community which is characterized by justice and equality must no longer be based on illusions.

It is for us to prove that things can be otherwise.

Mr. SIMONS (Minister of Labour, Suriname) – It is an honour for me to convey the greetings of the Suriname people and their Government to all delegates to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We congratulate the President of the 80th Session on his election and we are sure that under his skilful guidance the Conference will proceed to it a successful conclusion.

The Director-General's Report focuses on the question of social protection which is becoming a central issue of economic development. One cannot ignore the pressing need to secure a decent human level of living in these turbulent times of technological, political and economic development. The ILO has long pursued this goal and has come from promoting employment-oriented development in the early 1960s to the basic needs strategy of the mid-1970s, and it has recently been promoting policy for monitoring and repaying the social debt in Latin America and the Caribbean region. The main reason for this is the notion within the ILO that economic growth, as it is usually measured by a number of macroeconomic indicators, does not automatically lead to higher levels of employment or living standards. Theoretical discussion on this has continually been on the agenda of various national and international forums. It is not theory, but the concrete living reality of millions of people who live in poverty, the adverse political situation that has developed as a result of this, the disappearance of the Cold War and the persistent efforts of the ILO that have created a shift in the atmosphere of the discussions on social protection and social security. Now even hard-liners are willing to sit down and discuss the problem of poverty seriously.

Of course this does not mean that all policy and decision-makers agree on the magnitude of the social problem, and on how and when to solve it. But the fact of the matter is that now there is a rather open forum to discuss this problem. Proof of this lies in the various initiatives that have been recently developed in the Latin American and Caribbean region, not only by the ILO but also by the IDB and the UNDP, which have created extensive forums to discuss these problems.

In this sense the Director-General has chosen the right time to draw the attention of the workers, employers and governments of the world to the question of social insurance and social protection. Within this wide context, it is possible to discuss several questions, one of which is the eminent importance of the relation between structural adjustment and stabilization programmes, equity, workers' protection and social policy in general. These issues have long been of major concern to the ILO. It has been stressed that the human factor is a crucial element in economic development. Poverty in our countries, the system of social protection and security and the problems associated with these, however, cannot be isolated from the need for economic growth.

The economy cannot be adjusted unless people bring this about. We ask people to adjust their ideas, their expectations, their needs and their standards of living. At the national level we try to change the employers and the workers, try to create a new investment and work culture, redirect production, improve productivity and management capabilities. We ask the consumers to change their consumption patterns. We ask the people to change the real economy.

In bringing about these changes, monetary measures are inescapable if we are to create a favourable climate for development, but these measures in themselves are not enough by far to bring about the changes that we want in the real economy. Trying to change the real economy just by monetary management will not bring about the development that is needed. The monetary imbalances of our countries are not simply the result of bad monetary policy in a structurally healthy economy but often the money image of a weak economy. This weakness is the result of national as well as international circumstances and has developed in the course of history. Policies based on a one-sided monetary orientation do not comprehend to the full extent the questions that an integrated development policy poses and are likely to produce only short-term effects at high social costs.

Economic growth in this area depends to a large extent on restructuring or adjusting the national economy, especially in the face of developments at the international level. At the same time it must be recognized that to be successful in the long run such an adjustment process must be accompanied by a complementary process in the world economy. There is need for a more equal system of international trade, less protectionism and a real transfer of capital and technology to combat poverty and unemployment in the non-industrialized countries.

At the national level it is necessary to do away with the macroeconomic imbalances which create a climate in which it is not possible to run an efficient business that is internationally competitive. But if the real economy does not change, the underlying roots of the monetary imbalances will persist and result in a situation of continued stabilization policy with prolonged high social costs that weigh heavily upon the lower- and middle-income groups. The political sustainability of such a development process then becomes a main political problem that impedes the continuity of economic restructuring. An important conclusion drawn from the experience of the past decade is that changing the real economy, changing production patterns on the basis of an integrated economic and social strategy, lies at the heart of a successful structural adjustment process. If we elaborate further on this conclusion, it makes sense to say that structural adjustment is not simply an economic process but implicitly assumes the existence of similar and complementary social and political processes.

The discussion that is going on now centres precisely on the need for broad-based development strategy that takes into account not only the economic but also the social and political aspects. The problems associated with these three aspects should be given equal weight and be dealt with at the same time because in real life they form a whole and are constantly reinforcing or impeding each other.

In this context there is a heightened awareness of the social and political aspects of stabilization and structural adjustment.

In the sphere of political developments, there is a need to move away from repressive methods of keeping income and other demands of the people in check. Although experience shows that popular support for austerity measures as part of long-term policy is minimal in a situation of prolonged and sharply declining levels of living, we are convinced that national consensus based on democratic principles is our only alternative. In our efforts to reach this consensus we must be willing to go very far and try to achieve this at least for the distribution of the social costs involved in economic stabilization and restructuring. This is the position of the Surinamese Government, a position which we think of crucial importance in a society that is trying desperately to keep the process of democratization on track.

The main platform for national consensus is that of tripartite consultation, where trade unions, employers and governments can reach consensus on policies to be pursued. The active support of the ILO in this process can make a significant contribution to reaching this consensus at the national level by facilitating the exchange of experience and putting its expertise in social security and protection at our disposal.

Protecting the basic rights of the individual and of the collectivity, strengthening and protecting the institutions for participation in the political process are essential to develop and sustain a growth-with-equity strategy for development. At the same time these aims are also the ingredients for sustainable political stability, in which investors and managers are able and willing to develop competitive economic activities and where workers, governments and employers can freely engage in bargaining on remuneration and social policy in general. In this way it is possible to prevent structural adjustment policies of deregulation and liberalization becoming a caricature, a one-sided policy that only measures growth as the success of the individual private business.

In the late 1980s and the early 1990s, the safety nets that have been constructed to protect the poorest strata of the population against the negative effects of stabilization and adjustment processes have prevented the emergence of a group of "new poor".

The increasingly wider attention that the issue of social security and protection has received directs our attention also to those aspects that may not have received enough attention in the past. The question of abuse of the social security and protection system, the effectiveness and the efficiency of the system, has come to the forefront of policy discussions on the social protection system as policy-makers try to keep social spending in check without diminishing real protection of the vulnerable groups. There is a need for more precise identification of target groups, better design of protection programmes and the creation of more efficient institutions in this field.

The ILO can play an important role in the tasks her constituency faces. The new approach to technical assistance does promise closer links with the member countries and a more integrated approach through the involvement of multidisciplinary teams in the various regions. We do support this new system while being aware that the preservation of the tripartite nature of the ILO demands special attention in this process of change. We believe that the ILO, as one of the oldest United Nations organizations, will be able to make this change in its internal work procedures.

Original French: Mr. AKENDENGUE (Secretary of State for Labour, Employment, Vocational Training and Human Resources, Gabon) – May I, on behalf of the Government of Gabon, convey our warmest and most sincere congratulations to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his very welcome election to the presidency of our Conference. I address these same congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference. I am quite sure that their skills will lead to the success of our work.

I also seize this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for his re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO and for the rich report which he has submitted to the Conference.

Turning to this report, Social insurance and social protection, may I point out that a discussion of this matter is very appropriate for two reasons: first, social protection is one of the aspects of the policy of our States which has most suffered from structural adjustment programmes; second, the political changes affecting all African States today entail greater social demands for improved well-being.

Since independence our developing States initiated, to varying extents, social policies in favour of their populations. These policies, often modest, express the importance that each government attached to the well-being of its people. This effort fairly soon took the form of broader coverage of occupational risks, and the extension of this coverage to the whole of the population, in particular through the provision of free medical care for the poor and family benefits for rural populations.

Through these actions governments wanted to express their determination to extend to all sectors of the population the fruits of the economic growth that we were then experiencing.

Today, because of the multiple crises and constraints of the structural adjustment programmes, these policies are having great difficulty in surviving.

One of the points made in the Director-General's Report is that the countries which have the most reliable social security systems today are those with long-standing democratic traditions, where major changes in society are determined by consultation and agreement between all the social partners.

While it is true that our economic difficulties are obstacles to the development of our social security policies, it is also true that the harmonious and consistent development of these policies is possible only in the context of discussion and agreement among the organizations of workers and employers and the representatives of the State and all other national institutions.

It is the active participation of all these living forces that will determine how, and how rapidly, social protection is extended in each of our States, depending on the objective criteria defined and accepted by all. It then becomes possible for the decisions to take on the force of contracts which none of the parties can challenge unilaterally and which all will defend against outside demands.

The small size of the modern industrial sector of our Third World States is a major obstacle to the development of our social security policies. A reliable social security scheme cannot rest on contributors who represent no more than 20 to 25 per cent of the active population. Two solutions, among others, could be envisaged to remedy the situation: (i) a better exploration and exploitation of the informal sector; (ii) a better organization and leadership of rural populations.

According to the experts, the informal sector today is a potential source of jobs for the Third World, in general, and for Africa, in particular. But it is still not very well known and its immense potential is not yet exploited as regards social contributions.

This sector is home to a large percentage of the active urban population. Beyond supervision and organizational efforts, it is largely untouched by information or action as regards social security.

The rural exodus is still depleting our countryside. However, more than half the African population continues to live in rural areas. The policies of social coverage which have been initiated for them are limited to free medical care and assistance for large families. These benefits are financed by state subsidies. These are impoverished people without resources, who are unable to contribute to the financing of their own social protection.

An attempt at a solution would be to find ways of bringing this social category out of its impoverished state, encouraging the emergence of a class of farmers capable of financing part of its social coverage through its own work. The employers' and workers' organizations, governments and the ILO have also a great leadership role to play.

What can be said of clandestine workers, often immigrants or refugees, who not only accept wages below the legal minimum wage, but for whom the words "social security" are never mentioned in their relations with their employers?

All these concerns must be addressed for us to have a credible policy of social coverage in our States. A suitable response would be enlarge the number of contributors by reducing as much as possible the number of needy beneficiaries.

While recognizing the role of the State as a guarantor of the people's well-being, we are convinced that any social security scheme should be based, first and foremost, on a large number of insured people.

The Government of Gabon also welcomes the inclusion on the agenda of the item on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

When this item was last discussed by the Conference in 1987, emphasis was laid, inter alia, on the importance of tripartism in the design, follow-up, and assessment of technical cooperation projects. A project will in fact be more in line with what is expected of it by the people if all the social partners are involved in it. This fact is all the more obvious because our populations are in the thick of social and political change.

The involvement of workers' and employers' organizations in the sectoral employment policies of the State is an imperative and guarantees lasting social peace.

Tripartism, however, requires that employers' and workers' organizations should be better prepared for their role, that is, better organized and more aware of the real interests of their members.

We believe that the ILO should increase its efforts to encourage the promotion of responsible trade unionism in this new democratic environment.

The Government of Gabon can only welcome the active partnership policy, meaning the decentralization of the International Labour Office to bring it closer to its member States.

We remain confident that this new approach will enable the Organization better to pinpoint the particular needs of each State and consequently to initiate projects that correspond better to our development needs.

Mr. TAN (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – On behalf of my delegation I congratulate the President, Vice-Presidents and other Officers of this session of the International Labour Conference on their election to office, which is indeed a tribute to their competence and dedication to the mission of the International Labour Organization.

Today, as in the past, as it will be in the future, we shall grapple with the outstanding issues that centre on the promise and fulfilment of social justice. These issues will continue to test our capacity for consensus, not least the need for social insurance and social protection so ably discussed and dissected by the Director-General in his splendid Report.

As we engage, therefore, in this global debate, we are reminded that this subject can touch on the raw nerve of the toiling masses, especially the young on whose shoulders will fall the primary burden of subsidizing the cost of social protection. But even as the issue is addressed in various ways by different nations, the minimum of state responsibility demands that a government must insure its citizens against the hazards of death, disability, disease and old age.

In the Philippines this concept has found expression in the Social Security Act, promulgated on 16 June 1954, that has since been amended several times to expand social security benefits to cover members in keeping with the tempo of rising expectations. Yet, as we reflect on what the Director-General suggests as a reasonable social safety net for all individuals, the uneven stages of development and resources of nations cannot be ignored when the question is faced as to whether social insurance or protection of one form or another should be established.

But it must be stated with vigour and conviction that no government or society, however poor, would not set as a priority the health and happiness of its citizenry. These proceeds from the venerable philosophy of pater familias which obligates a government to act as would a father of a family to advance the general well-being of its members. In clear and unmistakable terms the Constitution of the Philippines declares that "the State shall promote a just and dynamic social order that will ensure the prosperity and independence of the nation and free the people from poverty through policies that provide adequate social services, promote full employment, a rising standard of living and an improved quality of life for all".

Since the promulgation of the Social Security Act of the Philippines in 1954, the system has extended its coverage to 13.2 million members throughout the archipelago, with combined assets of 76.4 million pesos. In pursuit of the ideal programme of social protection, it aims to enlist as members not just formal-sector workers, but the self-employed such as farmers, fishermen, home-based workers and housewives. For a country that has a majority of its people living below the poverty line, and 40 per cent of whose budget is allocated for debt service, the social security system in place, while it is far from ideal, is a modest reflection of a social conscience that even the poorer nations are capable of possessing.

We are aware of the international labour Conventions that mention the nine pillars of social security. Except for unemployment benefit, we have the others available in small measure. Nevertheless, the vision of a social utopia continues to attract policy makers. But the painful truth is that the race to overcome a forbidding future for our people will not be won if we remain hostage to international pressures that cannot leave us to our own devices in our pursuit of economic development.

In the ultimate analysis, the crucial question that we all must answer is: what will it take to bring us to this social paradise? The Report discounts economic prosperity alone or full employment as the sine qua non, nor better governance of a country and its institutions, but a combination of all these, with technical cooperation and international assistance as the catalyst of this heady prescription.

There is no reason for us to quarrel with this total approach, but to a developing country like the Philippines, full employment is a priority in its national agenda. Economic prosperity is a reality devoutly to be wished. Both may not be the sine qua non of social insurance and protection, but they will put us ahead in the lifelong battle against poverty. Toward this end, the systems and schemes of developed countries, as stated in the Report, cannot be wholly transferred to developing countries. Indeed, like wine, they could turn sour when transported from Europe to Asian shores.

In like manner, the penchant for saddling employers with payroll taxes, which has become the preoccupation of some members of our legislature, must be restrained. As observed by a student of labour relations, worker protection by legislation is not objectionable per se. In fact, only the most unrepentant capitalist would find it distressing. But the policy-makers should bear in mind that such an oversupply of enthusiasm for legislated protection will undercut a country's competitive edge, simply because it cannot legislate for its competitors. As we tie our hands with laws that are more honoured in the breach than in their observance, we legislate ourselves out of the market. We close the curtains on windows of opportunity in terms of jump starting our economic growth.

We must then set our priorities right before we embark on endeavours that feed merely on our dreams of better times. If there is one message that we recognize in the need to provide a people with minimum standards of pensions, social security and its varied benefits, it is that there are burdens to be shared by all. Those who have given of their resources ahead of others should be credited with laying the foundations of social stability, and it is but fair that those who come after them should translate a simple sense of gratitude into a programme of sharing and caring.

This demographic pattern of succession in equalizing social benefits and responsibilities is the enduring legacy of mankind since time immemorial. It is a legacy of justice and compassion of continuity and hope. For it is written in the Good Book that "one generation may pass away, another generation comes, but the earth abides forever".

(Mr. Badey takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. HERRERA TORRES (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) – I should like to begin by congratulating the President on his election, and Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General. I wish them both every success in their posts.

I come from a country in which we have always been taught that we are somehow different from the other nations in our continent.

Perhaps this was true in the past, or at least this was the intention of those who governed us, because when social guarantees and labour legislation were adopted at the beginning of the century, they marked a significant advance in the conditions of life and work of our workers.

We say this because, sharing the concern expressed by the Director-General in his Report concerning the impact of current economic policies on social affairs, our experience shows how it is possible, through the dazzling effects of the supposed results of macroeconomic growth, to mortgage and sacrifice social development such as our own, which was an example to the entire Latin American region.

That promising beginning did not go any further. The institutions created began to have conditions and limitations imposed on them and the Costa Rican State moved from being one which promoted social development to one which had to provide assistance to the poorest sectors of our country which are now in the majority.

The limitations, irresponsibility and loss of principle of a large part of the political class of my country which distanced itself from the ideals that it claimed to respect have led us irresponsibly to decline and weakness, like the other countries of Latin America.

Faced with a growing historical crisis, a hegemonistic and exclusive model has been imposed on us marked by the so-called economic structural adjustment programmes which have been promoted and even imposed by the IMF – a body within the United Nations system – and which is based on neoliberal thought which makes mankind a mere piece of merchandise subject to supply and demand in a market which is worshipped and magnified in an absolutely pernicious and ridiculous way.

The dismantling and the sale of state institutions to the supposedly effective private sector, which in fact is far from being so effective, without any definition of a new participatory and consensus-based state model, have resulted in a veritable denationalization and surrender of sovereignty in both strategic national spheres, and essential services.

If the income from privatization was effectively and rationally used for development, then we might even be able to overcome some of the limitations with a sense of expectation. But what is lamentable is that the income from privatization is either used to pay the external debt or is lost in unaudited national budgets which are inconsistent with the basic and urgent needs of our people.

The "modernization" of our nation, according to the dictates of neoliberalism, has led us to a fall in our national projection of 9.1 per cent, an increase of 179.5 per cent in prices, an increase of 9.4 per cent in official unemployment, a fall in real wages of 40 per cent, a 53 per cent level of poverty and a public debt which exceeds 114.5 per cent of the GDP.

Health conditions in Costa Rica, one of the vaunted examples of our national achievement, are beginning to deteriorate with the substantive reduction in the health budget and the return of endemic diseases eradicated in the past. This is the alarming case with measles. In 1990 we had only 70 cases annually whereas in 1991 we had 3,566, cases of which 21 resulted in death. In the same year the number of cases of malaria doubled.

The so-called programme for the reform of the State became a programme of massive lay-offs of civil servants which, aside from failing to resolve the essential problems of the State, has created new and serious conditions of social deterioration and explosion, has contributed nothing to production and has increased unemployment and the size of the informal economy.

My country, which is one of the so-called standard-bearers of justice and international law, behind the sleight of hand of abrogating articles 333 and 334 of the Criminal Code, which restricted the right to strike in the public sector, is now imposing on us civil service legislation which eliminates in practice the employment relationship and converts it into a kind of statutory relationship which gives pre-eminence to the interests of the State and restricts the basic rights of workers.

There is an arbitrary restriction in my country of labour stability and the exercise of basic rights by workers. Although my Government has been requested by the ILO to implement faithfully the Conventions which it has ratified, this has not yet been possible because, notwithstanding the existence of laws which are supposedly consistent with the provisions of these Conventions, no texts have been published to regulate them and as a result it is highly questionable whether or not many of these Conventions or Recommendations are actually in force.

On the other hand, the flood of new laws which are linked to privatization and others which benefit economic sectors of our society are expeditiously adopted and endowed with their respective regulations.

Our country, if it was never an exception, is all the less so now, and we cannot exclude it from the lamentable reality that makes up the whole Latin American region.

A lot was said about Latin America in past decades when the doctrine of national security was widespread in our continent, encouraging and nurturing dictatorial regimes which practised genocide and systematically violated the rights and freedoms of workers and peoples. Today, we view with deep concern the fact that if and when Latin America is mentioned, it is in terms which suggest that we have already achieved democracy, freedom, and have actually begun our development.

In all objectivity and with great pain, we have to say that in Latin America, behind certain outward forms of democracy and certain kinds of freedom, trade union leaders are still being murdered, workers' organizations are still being suppressed, people are still being locked up for freely expressing their ideas and new and even more aberrant forms of poverty and marginality are still being imposed on us.

The Latin American Commission on the rights and freedoms of workers and peoples published an extensive report in 1992 based on United Nations statistics which showed that more than half of our homes lack electricity and a that third do not have drinking water. But what is most painful and cruel and what makes us fear for our future is that 84.5 per cent of our children are suffering from malnutrition and in nearly 45 per cent of these cases, the malnutrition is serious and having grave physical and mental consequences.

The crisis of the past has now been compounded by the negative consequences of the application of the neoliberal model. This is a crisis and consequences which also affect workers' organizations, which are often subject to outside interests or to those of other sectors, with serious limitations being placed on the full participation of and commitment to the workers.

But more than a reality which oppresses us, it is a serious and disturbing vision of the future which is shaped by injustice, oppression and a lack of freedom. It is here that an organization such as the International Labour Organization must assume in full its commitment set forth in its Constitution to fight for social justice as the essential basis of peace and freedom.

Finally, in this difficult but very honourable challenge, we should like to assure the Director-General of our firm commitment and support as we move beyond the rhetoric of speeches and face up to reality, placing the suffering of workers and the least advantaged sectors over bureaucratic requirements so that every day brings greater respect for pluralism, as the only means of ensuring the application of democracy, overcoming individual interests so that we can all face the passionate challenge of not blindly following the trends that are imposed on us but moving forward with our commitment to bring about the full development of man and every man.

Mr. MAKEKA (Employers' delegate, Lesotho) – Allow me at the outset to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of this 80th Session of the Conference. Our congratulations are equally extended to the Vice-Presidents who we trust will assist him in guiding the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

May I also congratulate the Director-General on his re-election for another term of office and more specifically for his lucid and concise Report on the state of affairs of the ILO, particularly in as far as social security is concerned.

My country has recently gone through a democratic process of multi-party elections, which ushered into power a political party and marked an end of military rule. It is interesting to note that the erstwhile opposition party won all the seats in Parliament which means that there is no opposition in Parliament. This in itself puts a strain on our young and fledgling democracy. As employers, we fully associate ourselves with this democratic process and we can only hope that it will further spur our strides in strengthening and entrenching tripartism among the three social partners. We are concerned, however, that in a one party state or democracy the tendency is to promote the interests of one social partner at the expense of the other, and consequently to the detriment of the whole economy.

It is important for the ILO to double its efforts in technical assistance to strengthen tripartism in my country, as it is this tripartism which can safeguard this recently won democracy and in fact strengthen it. We have noted with interest that the Director-General in a paper put before the Committee on Technical Cooperation recognizes the importance of strengthening workers' and employers' organizations in developing countries, particularly in the least developed countries, to enable them to discharge their roles as meaningful social partners in the economic development efforts of our respective countries.

I must emphasize that this strengthening should equip us with capabilities to handle market economy demands such as understanding economic issues which have a direct bearing on social issues. It has to be pointed out though that the workers are already receiving the lion's share of economic assistance, particularly in as far as training is concerned. The time has come for an equitable balance to be struck in assisting the three social partners through their organizations.

Let me conclude this part of my remarks by adding a word of caution against making ILO technical assistance conditional on observance of ILO standards. All constituents of the ILO want to adhere to ILO standards, but we have to face the reality that some of these standards are simply too high for some of our developing countries to meet. Our failure to ratify Conventions at the rate expected testifies to this. On the contrary, we should be assisted so as to enable us to observe the standards and not the other way round.

When we talk about social security, employers in my country become apprehensive because of an assumption that employers are expected to shoulder the burden. Lesotho does not have a social security scheme, not because it is not needed but because for the past four to five years the Government has been advising its social partners that it was awaiting an ILO study on the most suitable and appropriate system. We have advised our Government that as employers we support the idea of social security scheme in the form of a national pension or provident fund scheme for the working people, to which employers and workers are to contribute equally. We must emphasize that the three social partners should have equal say in the use, disbursement and investment of the funds of the scheme. We are wary of situations where schemes of this nature are said to have run out of funds because of misuse of funds by governments. We also want to point out that we are not in favour of any idea of a social security scheme that is to cover non-contributing beneficiaries.

Last but not least, the new Government has assumed power at a time when a new Labour Code has come into force in my country, some two months ago. This Code, prepared with the assistance of the ILO, went through the tripartite mechanism. While in general we support the thrust of the law, we have to point out that it has introduced innovations with which we disagree, in that they run counter to market principles and merely impose standards which can hardly be met by most of our fledgling employers. We trust and hope that the new Government will take into account our concerns when reviewing this Code, and we call on the Government to consult its social partners, particularly the employers, when seeking ILO assistance in this regard.

Original Turkish: Mr. MERAL (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President on the occasion of his unanimous election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to state that we are certain that under his competent leadership at this year's session of the International Labour Conference successful results shall be achieved for workers, all toiling people and our world.

We consider it very important that the Report submitted to the Conference by the Director-General addresses the subject of social insurance and social protection at a time when the understanding of social welfare States faces severe attacks in many countries. This Report re-emphasizes the importance and responsibility of the ILO in this area under the present circumstances.

In our world the importance of the ILO in the struggle for bread, peace and freedom is forever growing. The tasks of the ILO and the United Nations concerning peace in the world are multiplying. In today's circumstances, when ethnic conflicts and confrontations are increasing, the ILO has a very important role to play to change the double standards predominating in the foreign policies of the major countries of the world. It can help in the prevention of "ethnic cleansing" policies in Bosnia and Herzegovina, of attacks against Azerbaijan, and of racism and xenophobia in some European countries. It can help achieve lasting peace and tranquility for all workers in the countries of the Middle East. Racism and ethnic confrontations that have been revitalized today constitute the most important threats to all workers and peoples. A most violent episode of these attacks recently took place in Germany against our citizens who, by their labour, have contributed much for many years to the German economy.

While responding with anger to this inhuman attack, we observe with satisfaction the positive attitude of the German trade union movement and of the great majority of the German population. We are for a just peace in our country and in the world, paying due respect to human rights and the rights of workers.

We believe that the ILO is responsible for the important task of securing the realization of the new economic and political developments and integration at the global level, without harming workers and all humanity. Workers and employers in general constitute an ever-increasing proportion of the world's population. Thus any step taken by the ILO in favour of workers means a step forward for the benefit of all humanity.

In Turkey workers and other employees face continuous and systematic assault, based on the most blatant violation of international labour standards. The coalition Government that was formed after general elections in 1991 has not fulfilled its promises concerning the democratization of the country, even after almost 20 months in power.

Turkey is still forced to live in a strait-jacket that it was forced into by the 12 September military rule. The concept of the Welfare State, which is enshrined in the Constitution, is not being put into practice. The State does not fulfil its tasks, especially as regards the growing ranks of the unemployed. On the eve of the twenty-first century there is still no unemployment insurance in Turkey.

Legislation is still in force that was promulgated under military rule and that blatantly violates freedom of association, the right to freely engage in collective bargaining and the right to strike.

Convention No. 98, ratified by Turkey in 1951, is still being violated. Employers dismiss workers who exercise their right of association without any valid reason. Convention No. 98 can only be effectively enforced together with Convention No. 158. Thus, we believe that the most effective means of preventing the continuous violation of Convention No. 98 is through the ratification of Convention No. 158. A measure taken last year to ratify this Convention was vetoed by the late President. However, the coalition Government has not yet taken the necessary steps to ratify the Convention following this veto.

Many employees in Turkey are employed with the status of civil servants, and are thus deprived of the most basic trade union rights. The freedom of association of these employees deriving from Convention No. 98 is restricted by administrative decrees and measures, and their right to collective bargaining is restricted by the Act concerning civil servants.

The right of association of public employees employed as "contract personnel" was cancelled by Decree No. 399, which has the force of law. This ban has been prolonged by Act No. 3771, promulgated by the coalition Government.

It is also impossible to reconcile the campaigns carried out by the Government in the mass media under its direct or indirect control to discredit the trade unions and their members in public opinion with ILO standards, or with the Constitution of the Republic of Turkey.

The 1982 Constitution, Act No. 2821 concerning trade unions and Act No. 2822 concerning collective labour agreements, strikes and lock-outs were all promulgated under military rule and are all still in force. They violate international labour standards and the ILO Conventions ratified by Turkey, and destroy free trade unionism, free collective bargaining and the right to strike. TURK-IS demands the complete amendment of this legislation and its democratization, and the termination of all anti-democratic intervention and regulation by the Government. At the same time, in circumstances where unemployment has dramatically increased and no job security exists, necessary measures should be taken to prevent the formation of scab unions under the control of the employers.

The restrictions enacted during the 12 September military rule and imposed on the right to strike are being effectively utilized by the coalition Government. Strike bans apply to many branches of industry. The coalition Government has suspended some strikes and resorted to binding arbitration. The coalition Government has acted as a strike breaker in some public enterprises.

The Government of the Republic of Turkey continuously violates the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention 1949 (No. 94), ratified in 1960.

Many officers and members of trade unions in Turkey, workers or civil servants are being charged and sentenced to fines and prison terms under the legislation of the 12 September military rule, on the pretext they resorted to legitimate industrial actions which are their most basic democratic rights.

Because of the fact that workplace inspections are considerably inadequate in Turkey, industrial accidents and occupational illnesses are an important problem. On the other hand, interference by the Government in social insurance systems financed solely by the contributions of employees and employers creates other important problems.

As workers, we oppose all forms of terrorism and separatism based on racism. However, we also oppose all anti-democratic oppression imposed on workers and people in general in Turkey owing to certain incidents of which we in no way approve. TURK-IS demands democracy immediately, everywhere and for everyone.

If trade union rights and freedoms in Turkey are reformulated in line with ILO standards, Turkey will set an important example for the countries of the Middle East and the new Turkic states.

We perceive the ratification of ILO Conventions Nos. 59, 87, 135, 142, 144 and 151 last year by the coalition Government as an important demonstration of good will. However, the lack of steps to amend domestic legislation to bring it in line with these documents, and especially the continued violation of Convention No. 98, show that we should not be too hopeful.

We welcome the reinstatement to DISK – the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey – of all of its property following its reactivation as an important and positive development with respect to the democratization of our country.

In Turkey, TURK-IS is the representative of all employees and workers. In the event violations of ILO standards in our country should continue, TURK-IS will make its power felt more effectively through legitimate and democratic means. During this struggle we request international solidarity from all workers.

If in 1993 the promises made to the workers and trade unions by the coalition Government and all political parties are not kept, if the anti-democratic remnants of the period of military rule are not eradicated, if the labour legislation in our country is not harmonized with international labour standards, TURK-IS will make a representation to the International Labour Office against the Government of the Republic of Turkey for non-observance of ratified Conventions, in accordance with article 24 of the ILO Constitution.

Original French: Mr. SALISSOU (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Employment, Niger) – It is a great honour and a real pleasure for me to take the floor before this august assembly and convey the cordial greetings of the Government and the people of the Republic of Niger. May I associate myself with those who have spoken before me to present to Mr. Abdel-Hak my sincere congratulations and those of my delegation on the occasion of his very welcome election as President of this Conference. We are quite sure that thanks to his experience and intimate knowledge of the International Labour Organization, the work of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference will be crowned with success. I would also like warmly to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Conference and assure them of our full cooperation in the debates. Finally, may I congratulate the Director-General for his re-election and for the quality of Report that he has been so kind as to submit to our appreciation.

My delegation is also very pleased to welcome those countries which have just joined the International Labour Organization and who are participating for the first time at this Conference.

The Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, meets the concern of the day and shows how the ILO is tackling this problem with realism and objectivity.

My country has ratified the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), on 9 August 1966. This ratification was limited to the coverage of three risks, namely old-age pensions, family benefits and protection against occupational accidents and diseases. Coverage only included civil servants and those working in the modern formal sector, as the Director-General has pointed out so well in his Report when describing the situation in developing countries. Thus as you can see that in the 27 years following the ratification of this Convention, the level of social protection has not changed. The reasons for this inertia are economic and above all political in nature.

In fact, since its independence, Niger, which has experienced 30 years of a one-party government and military dictatorship, only three months ago entered a new era of its political history with the coming of a pluralist democracy.

The single-party and military governments which ruled Niger for the past three decades never accepted internal dissent or tripartite dialogue which is a sine qua non for any economic and social development, and could not, therefore, whatever the economic situation of the country, introduce a social welfare policy which was worthy of the name.

It is only three months ago that Niger introduced truly democratic institutions and this was the culmination of several years of strenuous struggle by the people of Niger, in general, and the workers of Niger, in particular, led by the Labour Confederation of Niger.

The Government of the Third Republic, that is my great honour to represent here, has already presented to the National Assembly its declaration of general policy, a declaration which was adopted by an overwhelming majority. Among the priorities set out in this declaration, an important place is given to improving the living and working conditions of workers and of the whole of the population. The main points of the social policy of the Government of the Third Republic cover the three sectors which are essential for any social development policy, that is, education, health and full employment.

On employment, for example, the Government intends to implement a policy of encouraging private initiative and creating jobs through labour-intensive projects, while encouraging enterprises to train and take on young graduates by providing financial and tax incentives to young entrepreneurs. As regards the rural population, it is going to lay stress on small-scale irrigation, the protection and the rehabilitation of soil and also the promotion of small family enterprises for processing agricultural products.

As regards social security, at the present stage of our country's economic and industrial development, the Government's action is aimed at consolidating what has been achieved by improving legal instruments and the administration of the national social security institute. It is in this context that my ministry intends very shortly to examine the drafts for the revision of the social security texts adopted since the last sovereign national conference, and to submit them to the competent authorities for adoption. Regarding improvements in the administration of the national social security institute, my Government has adopted a restructuring plan, and obtained financing in April 1993 from the World Bank for a financial audit which will complement the actuarial study carried out by the ILO in 1991.

Turning to the programme of activities proposed by the Director-General at this session, my delegation supports firmly the "active partnership policy" which will bring the ILO closer to its constituents through a better understanding of their priorities and their needs by a continuing dialogue at the country level. The system of multidisciplinary teams proposed by the Director-General will, I expect, make up for certain shortcomings noted in the past few years in the ILO's interventions in member States.

Contrary to other United Nations agencies, I feel I have to point out that the ILO is less present in member States. However, today, at a time when the economic situation of our States is making it more and more difficult to implement a social policy, the assistance of the ILO is more necessary than ever. I venture to hope that the new direction that the ILO's technical cooperation is going to take will make it possible to achieve the objectives of the Organization.

My delegation welcomes, too, the proposals to reduce the length of the International Labour Conference at its next sessions. The adoption of this recommendation will enable developing countries to participate en masse and effectively in the work of the Conference.

Apart from the discussion of the Reports of the Director-General and of the Governing Body, the agenda of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference contains three items of very great importance.

Concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents, submitted to the Conference for a second discussion, my delegation considers that this is the right time to adopt international labour standards on this subject. Numerous industrial disasters which have happened in recent years should be weighing on the conscience of the international community.

My delegation fervently hopes that the Conference will adopt the corresponding instruments because we believe that scientific and technological progress should be an instrument for the protection of people and their environment, and not a threat to their health and lives.

The long-standing economic crisis of recent years and technological progress have turned upside down the structure of the labour market everywhere in the world. With the worrying increase in unemployment caused by the closing of undertakings, cutbacks in staff and the arrival of young graduates on the labour market, the question of part-time work has become a subject of concern in employers' circles and among governments and jobseekers. It is seen as a remedy to the employment crisis. However, the acceptance of this system as a way of solving unemployment problems requires a minimum amount of caution, bearing in mind that it sometimes has negative effects on the social protection of workers. This is why the adoption of an international instrument that is flexible and can be applied in all member States is very necessary.

Finally, I would like to close with a reference to a subject of concern to my Government and which fortunately is on the agenda of this session, and that is the role of the ILO in technical cooperation. As you know, the implementation of international and national instruments for the protection of workers requires the introduction of a certain number of legal, institutional, technical and other means in our States; in our present economic situation, we are not in a position to provide these means. The Report of the Director-General on this subject has very well described the problems facing African countries. This is why I make an urgent appeal to the ILO to redouble its technical assistance efforts to our States.

I cannot conclude my statement without thanking all the delegates present at this Conference for the confidence placed in us by electing us as a member of the Governing Body of the ILO. Rest assured that my Government will spare no effort to merit that confidence.

Original Portuguese: Mr. LANCA (Workers' delegate, Portugal) – I should like to begin by congratulating the President on his election which will ensure that the 1993 Session will achieve positive results.

At a time of grave crisis, resulting in the loss of millions of jobs and increasing poverty, social exclusion and marginalization, the Director-General's Report and the topics selected for debate are particularly relevant.

Under these conditions of social crisis affecting virtually all countries, social protection and security are, for a growing number of workers, the only source of subsistence and the only thing between a life with minimum dignity and the alternative of extreme poverty and social exclusion.

In Portugal, too, a country with one of the European Community's lowest living standards if we compare its per capita GDP with those of its Community partners, this issue is definitely on the agenda.

In terms of social protection, Portugal is one of the countries devoting the smallest percentage of their gross domestic product to this very sensitive area. It allocates at present 17 per cent, whilst the OECD average is 25 per cent, as we note from the Director-General's Report.

Unemployment is growing as a result of the total or partial closure, bankruptcy or restructuring of many companies, which invariably lead to job losses. The number of workers who are in work but whose wages are in arrears is also increasing again.

According to the definition of "poverty" established by the EC, Portugal has more poor people than any other EC country. One result of this is the emergence of child labour. It is estimated that there are some 30,000 children under the age of 14 at work.

We welcome the various initiatives proposed in the Director-General's Report for the countries of Africa, Latin America and Asia, but we would urge you to take a closer look at what is happening in Europe, and particularly in Portugal.

From our own experience, we can testify to the fact that the need for social security has not diminished. On the contrary, its development, improvement and adaptation to cover new social risks is needed now more than ever.

Portuguese workers are vitally interested in developing the existing social security system in Portugal on the basis of the principles laid down in the Basic Law, namely universality, equality, efficacity, solidarity and participation.

Ours is a system with a reasonable coverage of social risks, but with a very low level of benefits.

There are also problems with the way in which the system is funded. In the first place, the State has not met its legal obligations concerning the social security funding, particularly with regard to the non-contributive system of social measures. Because many benefits are universal, we need stronger financing to cover the whole population and therefore these benefits cannot be financed exclusively by contributions deducted from workers' wages. Secondly, the volume of employers' debts – deductions in arrears – is extremely high, being estimated at some 300 billion escudos, or US$2 billion. This situation can only deteriorate as economic activity slackens and industrial recession deepens.

It is common practice not to declare wages and thus avoid deductions. There is also the very real scandal of the proliferation of supposedly self-employed workers, who are actually wage-earners. But the social security system has done little to remedy this.

As a result of all this, there are now cases in which payments are long overdue, threatening the very system, and there are many workers whose wages are in arrears. This opens the way to privatization, which would oblige individuals to arrange their own protection against social risks. No one of good faith will doubt that this would be a very serious retrograde step.

For Portuguese workers, social security is an essential tool for creating social solidarity and cohesion. Workers will fight to protect the existing system and will demand greater participation by trade unions in the system's management, as the country's Constitution demands. The way forward is to expand and improve the social security and protection systems, not to cut them back. States must not adopt an incomprehensible and deplorable neutrality in the face of the absence of social protection for their citizens.

There are other issues which, while more general in nature, are still matters of serious concern to workers in my country. This is the case with the war in Angola, to which we are particularly sensitive for historical reasons. That is why we welcome the efforts made by the international community to achieve peace in Angola, and particularly the recent United Nations Resolution which renews the mandate of the peace-keeping forces and unequivocally condemns UNITA's belligerent attitudes and its calculated contempt for previous United Nations Resolutions.

At this session of Conference, we have seen countless examples of violations of human rights and of the right of peoples to self-determination. We, the workers of Portugal, cannot fail to express our most profound indignation and revulsion at the violent and repressive occupation of East Timor by Indonesia. We demand the release of Xanana Gusmao and all political prisoners, and we appeal to your solidarity with these victimized people.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Badey) – I give the floor to Mr. Pasaribu, Workers' adviser, Indonesia, for a point of order.

Mr. PASARIBU (Workers' adviser, Indonesia) – I beg your indulgence for taking the floor on the point of order. The Workers' delegate of Portugal has strayed from the topic under discussion, that is the Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection. Moreover, this august body is not supposed to deal with political questions which are of the competence of relevant United Nations bodies.

Had you given me a chance to speak earlier I would have requested you, under Article 14 of the Standing Orders, to direct the speaker to confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Seventh Report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Badey) – The next item on our agenda is the seventh report of the Selection Committee (published in Provisional Record No. 5F). If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Original Arabic: Mr. BENHAMOUDA (Workers' delegate, Algeria) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to congratulate the President and the Officers on their election and to express my thanks to the Director-General of the Office for the important reports which have been submitted to us. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election.

The Report on social insurance has given rise to a certain number of questions, thoughts, concerns and hopes. The majority of the countries in our world are suffering under the weight of debt, economic recession, increasing unemployment and demographic growth. These are realities which affect particularly the developing countries.

To raise the question of social insurance and social protection is most relevant at this stage since it is very closely linked to the questions of structural adjustment, employment and the issue of rights and freedoms.

Structural adjustments imposed by the international financial institutions have very serious repercussions on social security, as they reduce the financial resources available for social funds and they lead to the dismissal of workers and to belt-tightening in public spending. These adjustments are thus not helping social funds grow where they already exist, and in those countries where such funds do not exist, they create further obstacles to their creation.

Social insurance and social protection are closely linked to unemployment and purchasing power. Let us assume that all the required technical conditions are met in an enterprise. Skilled manpower is available, and production abundant, but the marketing of products is made impossible because of the deterioration of purchasing power and because of unemployment. What then will be the fate of such an enterprise? It will accumulate stocks, become insolvent and go bankrupt. The social security fund will thus be deprived of its contributions. If such a development takes place, and it indeed does in many developing countries, what then is the fate of the social security funds?

We at the General Union of Algerian Workers feel that the contributions of the State and of enterprises to social security funds are to be considered an integral part of wages. Consequently, it is one of the rights of workers to be able to participate in the management of such funds, in the monitoring of such funds and in the development of their strategies. These strategies should not be implemented solely from the economic point of view of the role of employers and governments, although we are convinced of the need to audit them through national systems to keep account of them.
